the Arab and silently steal away. They have no purpose of living here, and still less of dying on this side of the Pacific. Wherever they are located they breed dissensions, trouble, and strife. They are aliens to us in language, in customs, and in laws. We should not permit the introduction of any element into our body politic that will not assimilate and become a part of the same.

This the coolie never will do. He builds no schools, he erects no public buildings, he does nothing but work cheaply and as rapidly as possible that he may return to his native land and live in idleness. Men who have thoroughly studied this question regard their further coming as a detriment to the labor of our country. A system of underpaid wages is always a system of fraud and deceit. There is something so honorable in work, there is something so noble in industry, that the ingenuous mind regards injustice to the toiler with mingled feelings of indignation and contempt. In this age, and, more than all, in this Republic, it is a moral felony which the high chancery of a just

God will fully avenge. [Applause.]
Mr. Speaker, I shall avail myself of this opportunity to very briefly refer to a matter outside of the present discussion. Now and then, and more especially of late, in one or two magazines of the East and in a newspaper or two whose vision has never reached the other side of the Alleghanies, that the West has entirely too much representation in proportion to her popula-tion and development. As far as this House is concerned, we receive the same proportion of representation in the West that the other districts throughout the country do, and I believe if the vote upon which I have the honor to be elected is examined. it will show as many, if not more, votes than that east for any other member upon this floor, and I cheerfully invite examination upon that point.

But the criticism is not so much applied to the House as it is But the criticism is not so much applied to the House as it is that those States have the two Senators that are guaranteed to them by the Constitution; but I think, Mr. Speaker, if they would examine that side of the question they will find that these Senators represent interests that are as great as any Senator on this side of the Alleghanies represents. These gentlemen who are engaged in making these criticisms need to broaden their views. Nothing is more clear than that the interests of the results views. Nothing is more clear than that the interests of the people of the West are directly and positively the interests of the people of the East. We are not only your fellow-citizens, but your cus-When we are rich you prosper, when we are poor you tomers. Who suffer with us.

Sir, I am glad I represent a Western constituency. I rejoice that I have been honored with their suffrages. These are brave, bold, manly, and energetic people, who have blazed the mere pathway of the pioneer into a magnificent highway, and built on the other side of the Rocky Mountains an empire for you and for me. The men who are engaged in criticising them are merely the descendants of those who built commonwealths in the past, while I have the honor, sir, to represent those who create commonwealths and have been busily engaged in building States.

Mr. Speaker, the question of emigration is a grave and im-

Mr. Speaker, the question of emigration is a grave and important one, and especially that portion which relates to coolie labor. Had the Chinese emigrated to the eastern shores of this country instead of its western, it is my judgment they would have produced a revolution long since, because you can not place in any portion of this country a hundred thousand laborers who make their purchases from their own country, and what money they have left from every dollar they carn is sent to their own country for an accumulation that they can return upon. And it has only been on account of the unexcentional conditions of the has only been on account of the unexceptional conditions of the Pacific coast that we have been enabled to stand this drain for twenty years. And so I say this question is a grave one. We have to the east of us 300,000,000 of discontented people and to the west of us 400,000,000 of uneducated and unchristian races.

Upon this our native land meet these two great streams, the one white and the other yellow, and it has been said by someone "they can not flow peacefully upon parallel lines, but as the translucent waters of the Mississippi and the yellow flood of the Missouri mingle, the greater and clearer stream is stained and flows polluted to the sea." Let us then perform our duty without regard to politics, with courage and with conscience in de-fense of the honest labor of this country. Let us do justice, and under no circumstances forget our duty and our obligations to our native land. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with the greatest pleasure to my able friend from Massachusetts, Mr. Morse. I have also paid the closest attention to the able gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Draper; also to my friend Mr. McCall, from the State of Massachusetts. I also paid strict attention to the very able and scholestic continuous from Massachusetts. and scholastic gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. EVERETT, whose learning and logic I do honor; and as the debate proceeded I could not help but think that the grand old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, perhaps unwittingly, was engaged in

try prosperous. hen the silver debate was up, they then attacked one of our great products. Now, when we are seeking to give labor to our fellow-citizens, and to our own flesh and blood, Massachusetts is again here endeavoring to deprive us of that privilege. there will be passed through yonder portals a bill which, if I am not mistaken, will place the raw materials and products of the great West upon the free list. Then again Massachusetts will be found, as she has been for a hundred years, here seeking protection for her manufacturing industries and the placing on the free list our barley, our hops, lead, lumber, and wool; and as this debate has proceeded I could not help thinking of a similar scene that occurred in the House of Representatives fifty years ago. Then John Randolph of Roanoke, in a speech of great force, denounced New England and New England institutions. The grand old man, known as the Bald Eagle of Rhode Island [Tristam Burges] rose to reply, and in the closing remarks upon the proposed tariff legislation he said:

The policy of the gentleman from Virginia calls him to a course of legislation resulting in the entire destruction of one part of this Union.

Mr. Speaker, the policy of the gentleman from Massachusetts calls them to a course of legislation that destroys absolutely one portion of the Union.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman allow me?
Mr. WILSON of Washington. Not until I get through, and then I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure. I have only a few moments left of my time.

Then he goes on to say:

Mine own romantic country, must we leave thee? Beautiful patrimony of the wise and good; enriched from the economy, and ornamented by the labor and perseverance of two hundred years—must we leave thee, venerable heritage of ancient justice and pristine faith?

We must leave thee if the policy of the gentleman from Virginia is enforced.

We must leave thee to the demagogues who have deceived and sold us and to the remnants of the Penobscots, the Pequods, the Mohicans, the Narragansetts; that they may lure back the far retired bear from the distant forest, again to inhabit in the young wilderness growing up in our flour ishing fields and spreading with briars and brambles over most pleasant

Mr. Speaker, must we leave our country to the Courd' Alenes, the Spokanes, the Nez Perces, to the Yakimas and the Columbias, that they, too, may lure back the retired bear from the distant forest to roam over our fruitful fields?

When this character of legislation shall come to pass, may not the great West again become a lair for wild beasts and for savthe great West again become a lair for wild beasts and for savages; the graves of our parents be polluted, and the places made holy by the first footsteps of pioneers become profaned by the orgies of barbarous incantation. The evening wolf shall again howl on our hills and the echo of his yell again be heard around our waterfalls; the owl at noonday may roost on the high alture of devotions, "and the fox will look out of the window" upon the utter devolution away hy localestion as her beauty the utter desolution caused by such legislation as has been at-tempted in this Congress against the great West. In that hour tempted in this Congress against the great West. In that hour the gentlemen who have spoken against our interests can rise in their places and exclaim truthfully as old Tristam Burges did, in reply to John Randolph: "Hodie, hodie, Carthago delendo—to-day, to-day, the great West has been destroyed." Mr. DINSMORE was recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield me a minute to ask the gentleman from Washington a question.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts asking the gentleman from Washington a question, but I prefer that he should ask it after I get through. I will say to the gentleman that I would gladly extend through. I will say to the gentleman that I would gladly extend to him any courtesy in my power, but, as he knows, the time when this debate is to end has almost arrived, and another gentleman is to follow me upon whose time I must not trespass.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take any part whatever in this discussion, and I do not feel that anything I may say will add much to the force of what has already been said by gentle-men in the debate upon the pending measure. But it has ocmen in the debate upon the pending measure. But it has occurred to me, sir, considering the wide range which the discussion has taken, the very extended scope which has been given to the debate, that it would be well for the House to come back to a practical consideration of the actual question which is be-

We have heard a great deal that has been entertaining, interesting, admirable in the way of declamation and oratory, but it seems to me that the proposition offered for our consideration is very plain, simple, and practical, and one that we should deal with without entering upon such a wide field of discussion. We have heard learned dissertations upon international comity, upon treaty relations, upon the power and force of treaties when in conflict with statutory laws, and on the costitutional limitations upon such laws as the one which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has reported a bill to amend.

We have listened to gentlemen in their efforts to make this a party question, and I must say that I was somewhat amused a moment since when my friend from Washington [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Morse] met almost in an embrace, though differing so widely upon the question presented for the consideration of the House, simply because they had come to the conclusion that the Democratic party could not be trusted as to the exclusion of the Chinese, the silver question, or anything else. [Laughter.]

I say, Mr. Speaker, that these arguments and orations have been very entertaining and perhaps instructive, indeed they have been instructive; but what I would call attention to is that they are not pertinent to the question before the House. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. McCreary of Kentucky] in his dissertation on the force of treaties. I was greatly entertined by the most admirable speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], and followed with pleasure his thrilling sentences when he expressed, with fervid eloquence, his admiration of the great Chinese Empire with its ancient traditions, its civilization, and its institutions so far antedating those of our own country.

I have heard with much interest the denunciations by other gentlemen in their vigorous attack upon the Geary law, which is a law in force upon the statute books of our country. But what is a law in force upon the statute books of our country. But what is proposed, Mr. Speaker, to this House? If there had been a bill brought here by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to repeal the Geary law, then much that has been said would have been entirely pertinent and forcible in this discussion. But no such measure is proposed to the House. There is no measure here proposing to repeal the law which bears the name of my brilliant and able friend from California [Mr. GEARY].

A bill has been reported to the House simply to extend the time provided in that law for the registration of the Chinese who are resident in this country and who desire to be protected by this Government, and to that bill certain a mendments are by this Government, and to that bill certain amendments are offered by the gentleman from California. One of those amendments, it may be unnecessary for me to state, provides for the interpretation of the term "merchant" as used in the law. Another provides for means of identifying those Chinese who are resident in this country and who claim the protection of the Government of the United States. Another appertains to the arrest and detention of Chinese who have been held to be violators of the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am in the fullest sympathy with the bill as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I voted for it in the committee and I propose to vote for it in the House. I shall do so because, whatever may be the influences that have been brought to bear upon those Chinese who are living in this country, however many of them-there may be who are here in violation not only of law but of treaty, what-ever statements may have been made to them, and however far they may have gone indisregard of the laws of the United States, I believe that there are very many of these people whose minds have been influenced by the idea that this law would be held to be inoperative, to be unconstitutional and void, and who for that this Government, Mr. Speaker, can afford to be generous and extend the time within which they must register. But I. for one, desire that they should be required to register and identify themselves as lawful residents in the United States; and if they fail in this, that they should be deported from this country. I would not be understood as being in the slightest sense unfriendly to the Chinese. I am not so. On the contrary, I have many reasons for feeling kindly toward them. I have been associated in official relations most pleasantly with many of the Chinese officials. There is a great deal in their character which I admire, and I join with other gentlemen here in admiration of the civilization of China in many respects. But theirs is not our civilization, their God is not our God, nor theirs our people.

While I respect them, while I find much in the Chinese character to admire, the question is not whether we are friendly to the Chinese, but shall we protect American citizens against immigration coming into this country which is inimical to our interests, which comes in conflict and competition with American labor? That is the question. Are we entitled to resort to a law which will be effective in ridding ourselves of undesirable immigration and protecting our own labor from that of foreign countries? I would not extend the inhibition to the Chine alone, but would extend it to pauper labor from every country on the face of the earth.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak for a few moments upon the inter-relations of the two governments upon this subject. There has been an understanding between us. The Government of the United States is not trying to force upon China something contrary to her wishes. The Government of the United States may not be justly declaimed against by her own citizens and by honorable Representatives in this House as "unjust," "unchristian," "inhuman," "cruel."

We are in this Congress attempting only to carry out the provisions of the treaty and the Geary law, which is in conformity with it, and we now propose to make a generous concession to the subjects of China, which country is of friendly declarated. subjects of China, which country is on friendly relations with us founded upon treaty, and to extend the time in which they may register. I will say there are some things in the law as now in force which I find objectionable to me; but they are not under consideration here. There are provisions in that law for which I never would have voted if I had been a member of Congress at the time it became a law, but so long as they remain unrepealed they must be recognized as binding. And the purpose of this bill is not to repeal.

We are not asked to repeal the Geary law nor any of its provisions in the bill under consideration to-day. There is a simple proposition submitted to the House; and that is, the Geary law being law in force upon the statute books of the United States, shall we extend the time which it provides for the registration of Chinese, and which has already ended; and if so shall we add the amendments to the law which are suggested by the gentlement from California [Mr. Grappy] for the purpose of making the man from California [Mr. Geary] for the purpose of making it more efficacious and enforcing it successfully? Because, Mr. Speaker, if we have a law, the way to put that law in force and make it respected, is to provide such machinery for its enforcement as will make it effective.

If the Chinese in the United States come to understand that we have a law that can not be evaded, that it can and will be enforced, they will comply with its provisions. Moreover, the effect upon our native and citizen laborers will be equally salutary and will cause them to refrain from those acts of outrage and violence which have too often disgraced our country. There have been many occurrences of riot and violence in each country against the people of the other that are deeply regretted by both Governments respectively.

What are the relations between the Chinese Government and the United States Government on this question? I desire to call attention to the negotiations which have taken place between these two Governments. In the first place, let me read from the treaty of 1880, which was solemnly entered into, signed, and ratified by the respective powers. That treaty makes this provision in Article I:

Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States or their residence therein affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable, and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, finitation, or suspension of immigration; and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

Now, here in 1880, the two Governments agreed between each other that the United States Government might "limit, regulate, or suspend" the coming of Chinese laborers to this country. What does the Geary law do? Does it seek to do more? I admit there are provisions in that law which seem to me harsh in their nature; but the United States Government has never undertaken to do anything except to "regulate, limit, and suspend" the coming of Chinese laborers into this country. The doors of our country are open and will continue to be open to the scholars, the students, the scientists, the merchants, the visitors from ars, the students, the scientists, the merchants, the visitors from China, and to her young men coming to this country to study our institutions and receive such lessons as will be beneficial to them in their native land. But there can be no question that we have a right under the treaty to "limit, regulate, and suspend" Chinese immigration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Geary law was passed, and whether or not it is just in its provisions, whether or notit is constitutional, is a question we are not here to deal with to-day. The courts will deal, they have dealt, with the constitutional questions involved. We deal to-day with the measure presented from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is a proposal to extend the time within which under the Geary law Chinese residents of this country may register and identify themselves as residents, as distinguished from those who come here in violation of our laws and the provisions of the treaty itself.

Negotiations were entered into to revise the treaty of 1880, to form a new treaty. Not only that, but the proposed treaty was actually negotiated and signed under the express instructions of the two Governments respectively; but that treaty was not ratified by the Chinese Government. Now, let us examine for a few moments the deliberations and the negotiations that took place between our Government and the Government of China for whose officials I have the highest respect; and I desire to say that some of them are great men of broad mind, good heart, and generous of them are great men of broad mind, good heat, and generous states manship. I desire to reiterate that I have no inimical feeling toward the Chinese Government or its people. I know that every word uttered by me on this floor will be conveyed to gentlemen resident in that country whom I have the honor to consider my friends.

I would have them to understand that I cherish friendly feeling for them as a prople and a nation, but I speak as an Amering for them as a people and a nation, but I speak as an American in behalf of his own people, for the protection of American citizens and in their interest. No Chinese ever comes to this country to find a permanent abode. He only seeks a temporary residence for profit. No labor is ever done by him here that might not be performed by our own people. Every dollar he earns is a wage taken from American laborers, who must eat carns is a wage taken from American haborers, who must care bread by the sweat of toil; so many of whom are now out of employment and longing for the means of honest support.

Our religions, our civilizations, our morals, our manners of life are all dissimilar; there is no homogeneity between us. We can never assimilate such a population. Our laborers would not be admitted in China. Our people are not admitted for trade in that country except in a few ports that are open to us, while the whole United States is open wide with all of its cities, towns, and villages to the merchants of China. May we not, then, reserve labor for our own people?

Mr. Speaker, there has been a perfect understanding between the two governments with reference to what has been done on this question. Now, let us look to the correspondence and negotiations between the authorized agents of the two governments. In the first place, sir, I would submit for the consideration of the House the communication which was submitted to the United States minister, Mr. Charles Denby, by the foreign office at Peking. Here is the language of that official paper which was deliberately prepared by the authorized officers of the Chinese Government, and submitted for the consideration of the United States Government through its minister, its accredited agent at the seat of government in Peking.

Now China, of her own accord, proposes to establish a system of prohibi-tion, that those laborers who have not been to the United States will be strictly prohibited from going thither.

Nor any Chinese laborer who has returned to China from the United States, where he has no property or family, will be allowed to go back thither to run the risk of treading on the ground of danger. With regard to the Chinese laborers now remaining in the United States and that class of Chinese entitled by treaty to come and go of their own free will and accord, it is hoped that they will forever be treated according to treaty stipulations.

Has anybody proposed to treat them otherwise?

These are the outlines of the plan proposed for the prohibition of the Chinese laborers, but the detailed and minute provisions of the regulations relating to the same will be communicated to you for your information after they have been discussed and decided upon by the Chinese minister at present accredited to your Government.

This communication was in January, 1887. Now, let us see what the Chinese minister in Washington communicated to the United States Government in pursuance of the same subject and purpose. He says in an official note to Mr. Bayard, the then Secretary of State, in Murch, that is to say, the March following January, 1887, when the other memorandum was submitted to Mr. Denby at Peking, the following:

to Mr. Denby at Peking, the following:

In your note of the 12th January last an inhibition was proposed of the immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States for a term of years, and a discussion together of measures for carrying out the same was suggested, so that when agreed to they might be communicated to the Senate for consideration. And in reply of the 15th January last I said I had also several things to propose for your excellency's consideration.

Now, I have, in conformity with the instructions from the foreign office, carefully drawn out in detail certain provisions in connection with the proposed prohibition and restriction of the coming of the Chinese laborers into the United States, and the proper protection of the Chinese that are now in the United States, which I send herewith to your excellency, so that we may together discuss the same, in the hope that, when they are agreed upon, you may communicate the same to the Senate and I to the foreign office, for their respective consideration; and upon their approval by the latter the decree of my sovereign will be asked for the permission to have them supplemented to the treaty of November 17, 1880, in order that they may be faithfully carried out by both Governments.

Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, this antedates the Geary law.

Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, this antedates the Geary law. It is in pursuance of a desire on the part of the two Govern-ments, mutually entertained, to put in force provisions limiting and restricting Chinese laborers from emigrating to the United States; and the Chinese minister in Washington under the ex-press direction and instructions of his home government submitted to the Secretary of State the following proposals:

The proposed provisions are as follows:

1. China, having of her own accord prohibited the immigration of its subjects into the United States, will do so from time to time in such manner as may be required by circu-stances, there being no necessity for fixing a certain period for that purpose.

2. No Chinese laborer who has never been to the United States shall be permitted to go thither. Any such laborer who shall be detected in attempting to go to the United States by fraudulently making use of a return ticket and by personating the name of the person mentioned therein will be visited with a heavy fine.

2. Any Chinese laborer who has returned to China from the United States cannot go thither again unless he really has there his family or relations, money, or property, or accounts contracted through him pending settlement. But before he embarks for the United States he must furnish to the consul-general at San Francisco, for his examination, a full statement setting forth the names of the members of his family or relations, the locality where he has his money or property, and the names of the parties connected with the pending accounts.

But following this, September 17, 1887-that is the following But following this, September 17, 1887—that is the following September—Mr. Denby, our minister in China, a distinguished diplomat himself, a man of ability, impressed with a sense of the responsibility resting upon him, and putting aside any little influences that might operate in his favor with the Government to which he was accredited, there in its court, surrounded by its courtiers and by rival foreign diplomatists from other countries, presented the case of the United States, and this letter gives the details of his interview with Marquis Tseng, one of the most distinguished diplomatists in China, and others of the Tsung Li Yamen, the marquis (now dead) being second only in ability as a statesman perhaps to the great vicercy, Li Hung Chang. It is as follows:

[Mr. Denby to Mr. Bayard.]

No. 701.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Peking, September 17, 1888. (Received November 2.)

Sire: I have the honor to report that some days ago five ministers of the Yamen, to wit, Marquis Tseng, San Yû-Wen, Heñ Yung-I, Llao Shou-Heng, and Hei Chén, sent cards asking for an interview to-day.

I. of course, assented. Four came to the legation at 3 o'clock and remained until after 5. They stated the object of their visit to be to learn whether I had any information as to the passage of a bill by Congress absolutely excluding all Chinese from the United States. They said that they had received adispatch stating that Congress, being angry over the alleged rejection of the treaty, had resorted to this measure. I answered that I knew nothing about any bill having passed.

I said that China, and not the United States, had proposed the new treaty; that China had stated what should be the provisions thereof, and the views of China had been literally adopted by the framers of the treaty; that the conduct of China in refusing to ratify the treaty was unjust and indefensible.

has china had stated what should be the provisions thereof, and the views of China had been literally adopted by the framers of the treaty that the conduct of China in retuising to ratify the treaty was unjust and indefensionated to the conduct of China had not refused to ratify the treaty as unjust and indefensionated the conduct of China had not refused to ratify the treaty. She was simply considering the question. I said she had allowed it to go out to the world that she had rejected the treaty. It was so reported in the London papers, the Chinese papers, and everywhere in Pekin. In thus acting China was going back on its own express orders and directions; that the chinese going back on its own express orders and directions; that the treaty of 1889 was to exclude Chinese laborers; that the treaty of 1880 was to exclude Chinese laborers; that the treaty of 1880 was to exclude Chinese laborers; that the treaty of 1880 was to exclude Chinese laborers; that the treaty of the treaty of twenty years; that this constituted the only difference between the treaties except so far as the latter favored China in other clauses; that China had known since 1880 that the influx of Chinese laborers would not be tolerated in the United States; that there was not the slightest use of endeavoring to cover up or disguise this plain question; that we were not acting like Australia and certain British provinces in America, levying a per capita tax on Chinese passengers in ships; but that we announced openly our policy to be that the immigration of Chinese laborers must stop, and departing laborers could not return except under the conditions stated in the new treaty. I said that it was worthy of consideration whether the old treaty was not stringen legislation would be enacted. I said the only thing to do was to have present the shift of the provision whether the old treaty was not stringent legislation would be enacted. I said the only thing to do was to immediately ratify the new treaty; that the new treaty was attached at home

CHARLES DENBY.

Now, I have referred to these matters in order that the House may understand-because that is what I want to impress upon the House-the mutual understanding and desire of the two Governments upon this subject, as expressed through their accredited agents; and China has professed that it is her desire to do that which Congress has already done.

I am willing, I am desirous to extend the time in which the Chinese may register; but I favor also the amendment proposed by my friend from California Mr. Geary], adopting a more effica-cious means of identification of the registered resident. We are told that that is objectionable. What is required? Simply that they shall go to the proper officer designated by the United States Government when they register, and deliver to him a photograph when he receives his certificate of registration.

Now, that photograph has become a great bugaboo. They say it is a mark of indignity, a badge of insult, of disrespect.

Mr. Speaker, why should it be considered so? The statements made by my distinguished friend from California [Mr. GEARY] with reference to the difficulty of identifying a Chinaman are certainly just. It is no reflection upon them; it is no dishonor to them that they in their general appearance resemble each other more than our people, but they have not the distinguishing features of the Angio-Saxon race. The Chinese are all alike. They have an uniform complexion, uniform hair, uniform eyes, uniform dress, and we do know, and it is shown here in this correspondence which I have not taken the time to read, that there has been a traffic and a trade in the city of Hongkong in these certificates of registration, which have been bartered by returned Chinese to their fellows coming to this country who have no right to come upon our soil. Now, what we desire to do is to prohibit that; and I say it is no indignity to a Chinaman to ask him to present his photograph.

It has been said to him by designing persons, the Six Com-panies or their representatives—whose occupation I sincerely hope will soon be gone, because theirs is no honorable employ ment—it has been stated to him, I say, that these photographs are marke of dishonor, that they are to constitute a "rogues' gallery," a "blacklist." Mr. Speaker, such a statement, such an interpretation is wholly unwarranted. On the contrary, the reverse is true, because when a man presents his photograph, which he gets at small expense, it is filed, and is the best evidence procurable that that man is a bona fide resident of the United States, who, by the permission of the Government, is entitled to remain here and to receive its protection.

He stands in contradistinction to the Chinaman who sneaks in over the border from Canada, or who comes in in substitution for some other man who has gone back to Canton, or Shanghai, or some other Chinese city. I say this is a list of honor rather than of dishonor, and it seems to me that there can be no reasonable objection to it. In my humble judgment it is absolutely necessary to make this law practicable and capable of enforce-

Now, Mr. Speaker, I remarked a moment ago that I would not make the laws of exclusion applicable alone to the Chinese; and I regret that there seems to be a discrimination against the Chinese in comparison with the people of other countries; but I hold it to be, at this time, of the highest importance that we shall protect the labor of our country against pauper immigration, from whatever clime it may come, and having put the hand to the plow I would not look back. It is right and just, and it is a part of the province of this Government to protect its own citizens.

Why, the gallant gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] the other day said that the Chinese in New York compete with nobody except washerwomen. Mr. Speaker, has it come to this, forsooth, because women are washerwomen they are not as much entitled to the protection and fostering care of the Government as if they held a more conspicuous position in society? Are these poor women who earn their living at the washtub not entitled to more consideration from this Government than the Chinese laborer who comes here without our consent, contrary to and in defiance of our laws? If we have sentiment or sympathy let it be for the poor men and women, those who stand laboring under the shadows of the palaces of the "four hundred" of New York; while the princely owners waste their millions in luxurious living, let us defend those who by their labor earn the bread of life for themselves and their children.

For men must work and women must weep, When there's little to earn and many to keep.

And not only must men work, but women must work while they weep; and the labor of all should be as fruitful as we can make it. We should not countenance that class of immigration which tends to corrupt or to put out of work our own people. We should enact laws which are just for its exclusion. [Applause.]
A distinguished member has said in this debate that it has ever been the proud boast of Americans that America is a home for the oppressed of all nations. In the early days of the Republic, when our forefathers needed men and women to populate this great continent and subdue its wild forests and prairies to agriculture and industry, there was motive for such a boast. It was an advertisement, thrown into the columns of the world, offering employment and wealth to such as would come and assist in a great work.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to withdraw that advertisement. Our public lands are practically gone; there is not enough left to make homes for those already here and their children. I would not shut out those who come with good intent to be of us and our citizenship and who come under the tongue of good report with something as earnest of thrift and worthiness, but to the increasing hordes of paupers and vagabonds, communists, agrarians, anarchists, and incendiaries that annually teem upon our shores I would call a halt, lest the "oppressed" of other lands become the oppressors of this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] asks unanimous consent to insert certain documents in his speech. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. CAMINETTI addressed the House. See Appendix.]

During the course of the delivery of the above remarks the time of Mr. CAMINETTI expired and was extended. Mr. CAMINETTI. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I desire to offer the amendment that was suggested by the argument of my colleague from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It can be considered as offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is no amendment here.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after five days of debate I rise to make the closing speech on the bill under consideration. I shall be brief, because sufficient time has already been consumed in debate, and also because there is not much to answer, as the speeches made by the opposition have been mainly against Chinese emigration and Chinese habits, and these questions are not raised by the bill which I had the honor to introduce. I only seek to do that which will benefit our people and our country, and at the same time be fair and just

In 1892 I voted for the Geary act. I desired then and I desire now to encourage American labor, and do all in my power to advance the interests of American laborers and protect them from millions of Chinese who would rush to this country if there were no laws to prevent their coming. They do not worship our God; they do not assimilate with our people; they generally are inimical to our institutions, and in a century they would not advance our civilization and add to our science, art, or literature, but would only impoverish American laborers and drive them from the country which they have helped to make the fairest, the best, the greatest, and the grandest in the world.

coming to our country, my feelings of humanity, my devotion to justice, my desire to maintain the good name of my country make me also say with earnestness that I can not vote to drive out of our country as outlaws 85,000 human beings who were in-vited here, and who were encouraged by treaties and by laws of United States to come and locate on American soil, without giving them a fair chance to register and prove their residence. I believe it is the duty of every man to do what honor and conscience dictate. I could not believe and I would not believe I was faithfully discharging my duty as a Congressman if, without giving them a fair chance to comply with the law, I helped to use legislative power in this Christian and civilized age to banish and expel from my country nearly 100,000 persons who were misled or deceived by those in whom they had confidence and thereby prevented from registering, and on whose duty to register the highest court in our land showed a division and doubt that should appeal to every representative to hesitate be-fore imposing the sentence of banishment.

I have voted for every act passed by Congress since 1884 to ex-clude and prevent Chinese laborers from coming to the United States, and I am as much in favor of excluding them from our country as any Representative from California or from any other State in the Union. The question, however, is not now the pre-vention of Chinese laborers from coming to the United States. Laws already passed are ample and sufficient to prevent Chinese laborers from coming to our country, although the debate for the last five days has often sounded like we were debating the question of Chinese exclusion rather than the question of Chinese registration.

Tearing away the network which fancy and oratory have woven around the pending bill, and stripping it of prejudice and passion, it simply amends the Chinese exclusion act passed May 5, 1892, known as the Geary act, by extending the time from the passage of this bill six months in which Chinese now in the United States may register and obtain certificates of residence. It also amends the act so as to define the meaning of the word "laborer," and strikes out the word "white," in the Geary act, and allows one credible witness other than Chinese to prove that the applicant for a certificate was a resident of the United

One-eighth of all the Chinese in our country registered in the twelve months allowed them for that purpose; seven-eighths of them were misled and did not register because they were advised by able attorneys and by the chief officers of the Six Companies, to which they belonged, that the Geary act was unconstitutional and that registration was not necessary and that the tutional and that registration was not necessary, and that the Supreme Court of the United States would decide that the act was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. When the Supreme Court on the 15th day of May, 1892, rendered a decision declaring the act of 1892 constitutional the time for registration had expired. These deceived persons, many of whom had resided in our country for a quarter of a century, should have another chance. Surely sixty-five millions of people can afford to be generous and just to less than one hundred thousand

The object of the Geary act was not to drive out the Chinese already here, but to give them the means of proving their right to remain by registering and proving their residence in the United States. So full and explicit is that act on this subject that it provides that if by accident, sickness, or other cause they are prevented from registering in the time allowed by law, they can by proper evidence secure the privilege of registration.

I have listened to all the speeches of Representatives opposed to the bill, and I have failed to hear a single argument to justify Congress in refusing to give the Chinese laborers in our country six months' additional time in which to register. I believe cry six months additional time in which to register. I believe Chinese laborers will register and comply with the law if allowed the additional time, and if they fail to comply with the law they should be deported without delay. The cost of the deportation of 85,000 Chinese laborers, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, would be $7,000,000; therefore, it will not only be just to Chinese persons, but wise economy to pass the pending bill and save millions of dollars to the United States.

The pending bill is so mild in its provisions and so manifestly The pending bill is so mild in its provisions and so manifestly just, that I have been surprised that certain gentlemen opposed it so earnestly. Indeed, I have sometimes wondered whether they were masquerading or in earnest. The Administration has not been spared in this debate and assaults have been made on the President and some of his Cabinet officers which I know are utterly unjust and unwarranted. In all ages men have tried to make themselves famous by assaulting famous men. History has repeated itself in this Hall in the last few days. President Cleveland needs no defense by me. His able, patriotic, fearless, and repeated itself in this Hall in the last few days. President Cleveland needs no defense by me. His able, patriotic, fearless, and faithful discharge of the great duties that devolved on him made a grateful people elect him last November by a larger popular vote and by a larger electoral vote than any man ever received before in the history of the world at a free election, and he is now by his courage, fidelity to duty, and statesmanship proving that he is entitled to equal rank among the ablest and worthiest of his prodecessors who have held the great office of President. President.

I have coretadly examined the acts of the Administration as regards the enforcement of the law of May 5, 1892, and I say with emphasis that the Administration, with the facilities it has at command, with the money that has been appropriated, with the intent and meaning of the act as clearly interpreted, with the proposed legislation pending in Congress extending the

the proposed legislation pending in Congress extending the time for registration, has acted wisely and properly and done all that should have been done.

The decision of the Supreme Court declaring the Chinese exclusion act constitutional was not made until the 15th of May, 1893. A motion was immediately made for a rehearing of the case, and this motion was overruled by the court, but not until it had been announced that the President would call Congress together in extraordinary session. Public sentiment and the dictates of humanity and justice pointed unceringly to the granting of further time to Chinese laborers in which they could register and prove their residence, and there was no doubt of such a result in the public mind.

Soon after the meeting of Congress the Committee on Foreign

Soon after the meeting of Congress the Committee on Foreign Affairs, at its first meeting held to consider the question, showed that it was unanimously in favor of extending the time. The sum of $25,000 only was found to be available in the Treasury to enforce the act of 1892. This sum amounted to almost nothing, as $7,000,000 were required to deport $5,000 Chinese laborers. It was deemed best, therefore, by those charged with the execution of the laws, to arrest and deport such Chinese laborers who recently came into the United States from Canada and other border countries as were known to be violators of the law, and await action by Congress as regards those who are residents of the United States on the 5th of May, 1892. The report of the Assistant Secretary, Hamlin, shows that 152 persons were de-ported during the last fiscal year. In almost every case where a Chinese laborer was arrested almost every case where a Chinese laborer was arrested under section 6 of the Geary act, he petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, and when, on a hearing, the court refused the writ of habeas corpus, he appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and under the Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 763, 764, 765, as well as under rule 34 of the Supreme Court of the United States, the custody of the prisoner could not be disturbed conding the supremed disturbed pending the appeal.

It is not necessary for me to enlarge my statement about the Administration. It is clear that such action has been taken as regards the enforcement of the Geary act as will be indorsed by fair, just, and humane men.

Mr. Speaker, I desire the time to be extended as provided in the pending bill for the registration of Chinese laborers, and I wish every proper safeguard to be contained in the bill. Several amendments have been offered and are now pending. I have no objection to the amendment defining the meaning of the word "merchant," and I have no objection to the amendment requiring the deportation of Chinese laborers, to be executed by the United States marshal of the district within which such order is United States marshal of the district within which such order is made with all convenient dispatch. I have never believed that it was necessary to require that the certificate provided for in the bill should contain the photograph of the applicant.

The seventh section of the Geary act gives to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to require the photograph if he so desires. I have confidence in the opinions of Representatives from California and other States where Chinese are numerous, and if the members of the House believe that each certificate should contain the photograph of the applicant I shall not object.

the members of the House believe that each certificate should contain the photograph of the applicant I shall not object.

I see that my time is out and that the hour has arrived to commence voting on the bill and pending amendments. I therefore conclude by expressing the earnest hope that we will follow the dictates of humanity, justice, and honorable economy, and pass the pending bill with the amendments I have indicated. The SPEAKER. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the previous question is now considered as operating by order of the House upon the pending amendments and upon the bill.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I have sent to the desk may be considered as pend-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the amendment sent up by him during his remarks may be considered as pending. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that before giving consent we should hear the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1, at the end thereof, the following:
"Provided, That no Chinese person heretofore convicted in any court of the States or Territories, or of the United States, of a felony shall be permitted to register under the provisions of this act; but all of such persons who are now subject to deportation for failure or refusal to comply with the act to which this is an amendment, shall be deported from the United States, as in said act, and as in this act provided, upon any appropriate proceedings new pending or which may be hereafter instituted."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to regarding this amendment as pending. [A pause.] The Chair hears none. The question will be first upon the provision offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] as an amendment to the amendment of his colleague [Mr. GEARY]. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding the following:

"...d provided, That upon complaint, under oath, by any citizen of the United States, made before a United States judge, stating that any Chinese person is in the United States unlawfully, a warrant for the arrest of such Chinese person shall be issued by said judge and the said person shall be subjected to all of the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment, the same as if he had been arrested thereunder by a customs official, collector of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his deputies."

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARY], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The term "merchant" as employed herein and in the acts of which this is amendatory, shall have the following meaning and none other: A merchant is a person engaged in buying and selling merchandise at a fixed place of business, which business is conducted in his name, and who during the time he claims to be engaged as a merchant does not engage in the performance of any manual labor, except such as is necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant.

Where an application is made by a Chinaman for entrance into the United States on the ground that he was formerly engaged in this country as a merchant, he shall establish by the testimony of two credible witnesses other than Chinese the fact that he conducted such business as hereinbefore defined for at least one year before his departure from the United States, and that during such year he was not engaged in the performance of any manual labor,

Such order of deportation shall be executed by the United States marshal of the district within which such order is made, and he shall execute the same with all convenient dispatch; and pending the execution of such order such Chinese person shall remain in the custody of the United States marshal, and shall not be admitted to bail.

The certificate herein provided for shall contain the photograph of the applicant, together with his name, local residence, and occupation, and a copy of such certificate, with a duplicate of such photograph attached, shall be filed in the office of the United States collector of internal revenue of the district in which such Chinaman makes application.

Such photographs in duplicate shall be furnished by each applicant in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. GEARY was agreed to; there being ayes 120, noes 10.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. Caminetti], which was read a few moments ago.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Mahon] as a substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] as a substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That, in addition to conforming to all present requirements of law regulating immigration it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer of any steamer or sailing vessel to take from all Chinese and other allen immigrants embarking on said steamer or sailing vessel a statement sworn to by said immigrant, before the United States consul or consular agent to examine all persons presenting said statement, under oath, as to the truth fulness of the facts set forth in said statement. And if upon said examination he is satisfied said statement be true he shall so certify same on said statement, and without said certificate said statement shall not be received by the master or commanding officer of any steamer or sailing vessel, or by any customs officer or officer in charge of place of entry into the United States. So the bill was passed. On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORM OF ENGROSSING AND ENROLLING BILLS, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to introduce a resolution at this time for reference to the joint commission. It may be that jurisdiction of the subject-matter is with the Committee on Printing. But we desire to have it go to the joint commission, with leave to report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution to dispense with the present form of engrossing and enrolling bills and joint resolutions, and directing the use of printed copies for the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the entleman from Tennessee that this resolution be referred to the joint commission, to report at any time?

There was no objection.

SAFETY OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2344) for the better control and to promote the safety of national banks.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this bill was under consideration be-fore the House a few days ago, and at the request of the gentle-man from Kentucky having charge of the Chinese bill, which we have just disposed of, I yielded to him for the consideration of that proposition.

I do not desire to go into any extended explanation of the matter further than I did on the occasion referred to, and I do not think that there can be any serious objection or any kind of difficulty in understanding the propositions now submitted. will be proper for me to say here and now that the object of this bill is not to inaugurate any sort of a financial system or any financial idea whatever. It has no relevancy at all to the issuance of currency or to the general principles of banking. It makes no change in the financial system whatever in any respect. It is only a measure of safety and protection, as I shall presently show.

The sole object of the bill is to prevent the officers of national banking institutions-presidents, vice-presidents, and cashiers, or other officers of the bank-by a combination, to absorb the assets of the institution and prevent them from destroying the bank, which has been the result so far as national banks have been concerned in over two-thirds of the cases where these banks have failed. It was never intended as a financial measure. It refers solely to the administrative duties of the officers of the bank, and while it is not difficult to impose certain restrictions on the officers of the bank and yet preserve the bank, the committee, with the exception of one member, unanimously report the bill after mature deliberation, and not only recommend its passage, but in the last Congress it was considered and passed the House, was amended in the Senate, whereby it went into conference, and there it ended. Now, the points in the bill are these: Recognizing the fact and the truth, which can not be denied, that national banks have been broken generally because of speculations engaged in by the president, vice-president, and cashier of the institution, the committee deem it important that some such provision as this should be incorporated into law. Let me illustrate the fact that the banks have been broken by such a process by calling your attention to only two or three recent instances. The Fidelity Bank tion to only two or three recent instances. The Fidelity Bank of Cincinn it affords one illustration. There was another at Boston which furnishes a later illustration, and two banks in Philadelphia, as you all remember. In my own district we had a very severe illustration of it, where the cashier by certain manipulations absorbed all of the assets of the bank.

Now, as that is the root of the evil, what is the proposition of the bill? Simply that when any officer, employé, or servant of the bank makes an application for borrowing the funds of the bank such application shall be made in writing. That shall be submitted to the directors of the bank, and, of course, very often the applicant for the loan of the fund is a director of the bank. In that event he is excluded from any consideration of the application. Whenever, therefore, a director, officer, employé, or servant of the bank makes an application for a borrowing of the funds of the bank, he must make that application, as I have said, in writing. When he does that the application is addressed to the directors of the bank, and is entered on the minutes of the bank, and the votes of the directors are recorded as to the application, yea and nay.

Now in the country banks it is very difficult sometimes to get the board of directors together so as to consider an application for a loan. To obviate that trouble we provide in this bill that the executive committee of the bank, and they all have them in the country banks—that the application shall be made to that committee in writing, and when the application is mide that committee shall report their action upon it to the next meeting of the board of directors, and when that is done it is made a matter of record on the minutes of the bank.

Now let us stop here for one moment and see what is the purport and object of that. It is to prevent the president, vice-president, eashier, or any other officer of a bank, through nego-tiations of their own, from obtaining the funds of the bank with-out publicity and notoriety to the directors of the bank. The object of the provision with reference to the executive committee is to carry out the same thing, and in case the application is made to them, they shall report it back to the directors of the bank, and that report becomes a part of the record of the minutes of the bank, so that every director can see what is proceeding in the bank.

Now, will you allow me to say here, before I pass from that branch of this bill, that in substantially all these bank failures to which I have referred they have grown out of the fact of the officers of the bank making applications for loans, and so obtaining the funds of the bank. That is generally done through the application of the president or the vice-president, with the concurrence of the cashier; and very often he is into the trans ection. currence of the cashier; and very often he is not the translection. The result is that before the directors know what has become of the funds of the bank they have certain paper there which represents the funds; but when they come to investigate it, it is a responsibility only of the officers of the bank. That is exactly what has occurred here in many instances.

Now, another idea in this bill is in the same line. Of course I do not mean to say you can legislate honesty into the officers of a bank, but you can throw such restrictions around them as to make it your difficult for them to accomplish, a wrong object.

a bank, but you can throw such restrictions around them as to make it very difficult for them to accomplish a wrong object. Even if that is done, it will accomplish good. This proposition also provides that the cashier of a bank when he is called on for a report to the Comptroller of the Currency shall show in a separate schedule—not the ordinary one upon which the reports are made—the liability of every officer, or employe, or servant of the hand, whether that liability is incompared as a single controller. the bank, whether that liability is incurred as principal, surety,

Now, what is the object of that? It is that the attention of the Comptroller may be called to the condition of the bank, to show whether or not the officers of the bank are absorbing the funds. The moment that is done the Comptroller has ample power. There is no trouble upon that proposition. Then it follows as the next idea that if these cashiers, presidents, vice-presidents, or directors make applications for loans, we excuse the publication of that liability in the general reports of the bank. It is obvious to every one why that is done. It is because no director or business man wants his private business published in a newspaper, to show how much money he has borrowed or how much he has loaned. Further than this, the overdrawing of an count by an officer or servant of a bank is absolutely prohib-

That is the general outline of the bill. Now, in order that I may be explicitly understood, before I go further, I will yield to any question that may be propounded to me.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman states that the prohibition of the making of loans to officers of the bank also applies to directors, if I understand him?

Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now I want to call the gentlemen's attention to the language of the bill to see whether that is true

That no national banking association shall make any loan to its president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ until the proposition to make such a loan, stating the amount, terms, and security offered therefor, shall have been submitted in writing by the person desiring the same to a meeting of the board of directors of such banking association, or of the executive committee of such board, if any, and accepted and approved by a majority of those present constituting a quorum.

Now, later on in the same section a director by name is pro-hibited from making an overdraft; and it seems to me that the restriction, in the language of the first section, might not apply to directors. Very possibly it does apply, but I want to bring that matter to the gentleman's attention.

Mr. COX (reading):

No such association shall permit its president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its directors, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ to become liable to it by reason of overdrawn account.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the first part of the section does not apply to directors

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The word "director" is not mentioned in the first section along with the other officers of the

I catch your point. You think the word "director" ought to be included in the first section.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. From the statement the gentleman made he evidently thought that directors were included. It seems to me they were not. I think they ought not to be included, I will say to the gentleman, but I wanted to see whether they were included or not.

Mr. COX. Let us see now:

That no national banking association shall make any loan to its president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ——

Mr. LANE. The word "director" ought to be included.
Mr. COX. I have no objection in the world to include the word "director."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think it ought to be there.

I do not know but what the gentleman's language was wide enough to cover what the gentleman stated as the intent of the bill, and that they were to be included. I wanted to find out whether they were included.

Mr. COX. You are perfectly right in your understanding of my idea of it, that it includes the director, he being an officer. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. A director might be an officer, but not the president or vice-president.

Mr. COX. He can not be a director unless he is a stockholder of the bank.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Of course, he has to be a stockholder to be a director.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the report. It seems that whoever drew the bill and the report did not intend the director to be included. In the report you quote from the Comptroller:

It would be unwise to forbid an association to loan or to discount for its several directors, as they are usually selected from among the leading men of the various branches of business for the reason that they possess information of great value in passing upon paper offered by those in some line of trade with themselves.

Mr. COX. Will you pardon me, I did not catch the part you were calling attention to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am referring to the report. You quote from a part of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, in which, while recommending the passage of a bill like this, he expressly says that the director should not be included; and therefore it is evident that whoever drew the bill did not intend to include the directors.

Yes, I see the gentleman's point, and now I will Mr. COX.

answer him

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Maine quotes the report of the Comptroller of the Currency to show that the directors should not be prohibited from borrowing.

Mr. DINGLEY. I gave no opinion in the matter.

Mr. HEARD. I simply desire to say that the idea that I have of the Comptroller's allusion in his report to the directors is this, that it would be unwise, perhaps, to prohibit the directors from borrowing from the bank, but I think it would be perfectly proper to subject their paper to the same scrutiny as that of any other party applying for a loan; in other words, why should their paper be accepted without being scrutinized just the same as the paper of any other person?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not making any point upon that matter; I am simply calling attention to the fact that this bill does not include directors, as shown by the report.

Mr. HEARD. Therefore, I desire to say, that I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, who says that it was his opinion that the director is included, and that if it does not include directors it should. My judgment is that that is a point that should be secured, so as to prevent the directors, the men who are the trustees for the stockholders, from loaning money of the depositors without the proper safeguards.

Mr. COX. You can see the extent of the bill in a moment when you get started right. Let me call the attention of my friend for one moment to this statement of the Comptroller:

It would be unwise to forbid an association to loan or to discount for its several directors, as they are usually selected from among the leading men of the various branches of the business, etc.

You catch the point there. Now, this bill does not prohibit loans to them; and what the Comptroller meant was to repel the idea that you would prohibit the directors from borrowing money, or the officers. Now, then, what does this bill prohibit? While I think that the language is broad enough to cover all the officers, and that it would be nonsense to say that the president could not borrow, or that the vice-president could not borrow, or that none of the employés could borrow, none of servants could borrow, unless certain things were done, and then exclude the directors. The idea in the bill is that it covers the exclude the directors. The idea in the bill is that it covers the whole of the parties who have any connection with the bank.

Mr. DINGLEY. You would have to amend it to include the

Mr. COX. I would not object to that, and that is what it means, as I think; but there is no use quibbling upon a point when we can agree upon an idea.

Now, let me pass to another point suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I think his idea was that the directors ought to be excluded.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think the directors ought to be excluded. I think the bill is right as it reads, but the gentleman stated to the contrary.

Mr. COX. I am very sorry that I misled the gentleman, but I know the bill is intended to cover every one connected with

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Including the directors?
Mr. COX. Including the directors.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In all its provisions?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir. Mr. DINGLEY. That ought to be understood, because the point is a very important one.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting the word "directors" in the fourth line.

Mr. COX. Wait a moment. While I am satisfied from examination of the language of the bill that it is all right, I do not a make a calible about a word and I am willing that on desire to make a quibble about a word, and I am willing that on the third page of the bill, where it recites the president, the vice-president, and cashier, the words "or any director" shall be inserted.

Following that there is another point to which I call attention. On page 3, line 14, after the word "unpaid," I would insert the words "by the aforcsaid parties." That makes the provision more clear and definite. On the same page, in line 16, after the word "require," I would insert the words "or permit."

when you make these changes, I think there will be no difficulty in understanding clearly the purpose of the bill. The object, as I said before, is not to put forward any financial idea. The bill is intended simply to cure a very serious evil, which I can illustrate by stating that in my own district we have a national bank where the cashier and other officers have seemed to absorb all the funds. What we are trying to do is to put such restrictions upon that kind of operation as to prevent its being carried on, and to make whatever is done open and patent to the

There is no special financial idea in the bill, no idea of extending or of curtailing the rights, powers, or privileges of national banks. Every man must see the propriety and importance of a law which shall provide that the depositors and the stockholders, who have no representation except through the directors of the bank, shall be protected by every kind of restriction that will tend to prevent the illegitimate absorption of the funds.

Mr. DINGLEY. I see that the word "agents" is used here.

What does that mean in connection with a bank?

Mr. COX. Well, that is put in as a mere matter of precaution. I do not know how a bank could have an agent in the technical sense of the word, but there can be no harm in leaving that there so as to cover all the parties connected with the bank.

Mr. DINGLEY. Would it cover the case of a national bank undertaking to place the loan of a municipality, and which should appoint an agent in one or more cities for the sale of the bonds?

Mr. COX. Where the bank undertakes to make such a loan? Mr. DINGLEY. Not where the bank undertakes to make the loan, but where it undertakes to sell the bonds.

Mr. COX. The only way that could be worked would be by re-discounting. That would go through the officers of the bank, be-cause when they undertake to make a rediscount of a note it has to be indersed by the proper officers.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman misunderstands me. My question is this: Supposing that a national bank undertakes to place bonds which have been issued by a municipality, and, for that purpose, appoints agents at different places, would such agents be included within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. COX. I think not.

Mr. DINGLEY. You think the word "agent" here would not cover that case?

Mr. COX. I think it would not.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What does this language mean: "Or other persons in its employ?" Does that include the attornev of a bank? Yes, sir. Mr. COX.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I mean its attorney at law.

Mr. COX. If the attorney at law loans himself to the officers of the bank to become the straw man for the indorsement of their paper in order to obtain the funds, I think he ought to be included as much as anybody else.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Suppose he accepts a retainer?

Many of the banks retain their attorneys by the year.
Mr. COX. Suppose he does; this would not apply to him.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, he would be in the employ of the bank. Yes; but the object of this provision is to protect Mr. COX. the banks, and when an attorney becomes a straw man for the benefit of the cashier, or of any officer of the bank, then he ought to be reached by law.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Suppose he himself wants to bor-

Mr. COX. That is all right. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But would he come under this pro-

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But would be come under this provision of your bill?
Mr. COX. Certainly he would.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. As well as any other person who might be employed in the bank?
Mr. COX. Certainly; all who act as straw men for the benefit of any officer connected with the bank. The object is to cut officer than the strain of the content of the conte the opportunity for any agent, attorney, officer, or servant of the bank from obtaining money as a loan until the application for the loan is duly submitted. Now, if we exempt the attorney of the bank from the operation of this provision, is it not obvious at once that the whole pith of the bill is destroyed? That seems to me very plain.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to know whether the first section of this bill is designed to affect the statute which limits the amount of money that may be loaned to any one person.

Mr. COX. It has no such effect.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the language of the provision ought to be guarded, because the bill now provides that whenever the person makes his application for a loan, stating the amount, and offers his securities, which are accepted, the bank must loan him the money. Mr. COX. No.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is the effect of the language as it

Mr. COX. Allow me to say to the gentleman— Mr. CULBERSON. I understand what the existing law is on this subject. It provides that no loan shall be made to any one person for more than 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of the bank. But here you provide that any director may borrow to any amount, there being no limitation or specifica-

Mr. COX. There is where I differ with the gentleman en-

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no limitation upon the provision

Mr. COX. It was never contemplated that this bill should change the existing law at all, so far as concerns the percentage of the capital stock that might be loaned to any one person.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not suppose there was any such intention; but that such is the effect of the language is evident to my mind.

Mr. COX. Now, let us see what the bill provides on this sub-

That no national banking association shall make any loan to its president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ until the proposition to make such a loan, stating the amount, terms, and security offered therefor, shall have been submitted in writing by the person desiring the same to a meeting of the board of directors of such banking association, or of the executive committee of such board, if any, and accepted and approved by a majority of those present constituting a quorum.

Now the language-and I trust my learned friend from Texas will allow me to differ with him—

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. That language never did contemplate the idea that the loan made to a director should be greater than that allowed

Mr. CULBERSON. I am perfectly satisfied that it was not the intention of the committee to remove the limitation in that respect. But I think some limiting language ought to be inserted to proclude the construction to which the provision is

Mr. COX. I have no objection to any limitation which may be deemed necessary for that purpose.

Mr. HEARD. I suggest that there be added after the word "quorum" these words: "and then not in excess of the amount now allowed by law

Mr. CULBERSON. That would meet the difficulty.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to any amendment of that kind. If we can agree upon the objects to be accomplished by the bill, I am not disposed to quibble about the language.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. COX. Yes. sir.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I would like to reply for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in regard to the question whether this provision would apply to an attorney of the bank. I can not agree with my colleague on the committee that the bill contemplates a case of that kind.

My recollection of the rule of legal construction, especially in regard to criminal statutes, is that where certain individuals are named or specified and there follows a general clause, that general clause never includes any more than is embraced in the individual specification. If that be the correct rule of construction (and it seems to me there can be no mistake on that point), then this provision could not include any other persons than those specified—"the president, vice-president, cashier, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, or servants." The general clause which is added, "or other persons in its employ," is similar to that which we frequently find in criminal statutes,

A MEMBER. Why not then strike it out?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not see that does any good or any harm. A general clause of that kind is very commonly in-any harm. A general clause of that kind is very commonly in-serted in statutory provisions, but it does not extend their scope. Mr. MARVIN of New York. The question has been asked here as to the meaning of the word "agent." Now, that term, in its usual acceptation in banking business, is understood as meaning the redemption agent or city correspondent of a country He is called the agent of the country bank, and generally has in his possession a large amount of the money of the country bank to meet drafts upon it.

Mr. COX. You mean the correspondent of the bank.
Mr. MARVIN of New York. The correspondent of the bank.
Now, there is apparently a crudity in this bill in inserting that word "agent" among those who may be the borrowers of the

Mr. COX. So far as regards the correspondent of a bank, this bill has no application to him whatever.

Mr. MARVIN of New York. I suppose it is not intended to have.

Mr. COX. Not at all. The person with whom a bank deposits its money for the purpose of meeting drafts upon it—just as in our country we send money for convenience to New York-a person receiving money in that way is not technically the agent of the bank; he is simply a depositary of the money of the bank upon which it may check.

Mr. MARVIN of New York. But every one of these banks receiving deposits in this way from a country bank allows interest on such deposits-becomes a creditor of the country bank.

Mr. COX. Suppose that is so; it does not change the relation between the home bank and its correspondent.

Mr. MARVIN of New York. The city bank is in effect a borrower from the country bank and pays it interest.

Mr. COX. My dear sir, every man who puts a dollar in a national bank is in one sense of the word a loaner to the bank.

Mr. MERCER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him

Mr. MERCER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there? You provide here that the president, vice-president, cashier, or any clerk, teller, or other official of the national bank shall not make any loan except under certain conditions. Now, what, let me ask, is there to prevent the president's wife or the vice-president's wife from doing just that thing?

Mr. COX. My dear sir, when we undertake to legislate on the men we may just as well let the women go by.

Mr. MERCER. Still, there is no way to prevent that, as far as i can see.

as I can see.

Mr. COX. No, sir: I do not know of any good bank that would take a married woman's note for money when they knew the

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does not that question show the utter futility of this kind of legislation?

Mr. COX. I think not. You can not legislate to meet every

Mr HOPKINS of Illinois. Of course not. But it strikes me that in order to meet exceptions existing here and there, it is not a wise plan to undertake to fix a general rule. Now, let me

Mr. COX (interrupting). I know exactly the way my friend's mind runs. Let me ask him a question now: Do you know of any national bank that was ever broken by the wife of the president or of the vice-president drawing the money of the bank?
Mr. HCPKINS of Illinois. I am not discussing that.

Mr. COX. But that is just what I am discussing. I am discussing the way these banks get broken, and I am trying to get you down to that point. We propose to apply a remedy here.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. From your statement, if this bill be adopted, a dishonest president, vice-president, or director can not wreck the bank; but now suppose you put in your pro-hibition against all of these dishonest officials and say they cannot do it, what then is to prevent its being done by the sisters, cousins, aunts, and wives?

Mr. COX. I can hardly assume that if the president of a bank is dishonest the whole family is dishonest. That is going a little too far.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But my point is this

Mr. COX. Oh, I know your point.
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That with four or five thousand national banks all over the country the administration of these banks in the main has been honest, economical, and for the best interests of the public.

Mr. COX. I am not criticising the action of the banks at all in that regard

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is it not a vicious principle in legislation, when you find an exception, to undertake to make a general law that will apply? You undertake here to apply a rule to all of the banks throughout the country because some individual has been dishonest.

Mr. COX. Is that a question or a speech?
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, if the gentleman can not answer it, it does not make any difference what you call it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman need not be anxious about a question of that sort. I will answer it. When I can not answer a question I will tell you so frankly.

The proposition here is not to hamper the bank in its opera-

There is not a depositor in the United States who would not approve the law, or any honest director of a bank who would oppose it. Now, whenever a director wants to borrow money he ought not to object to make his application in writing. What is the object of doing that? It is that the directors when they meet shall have notice of the application, and I do not see how any man who proposes to deal honestly with his fellow-men can ect to a provision of that sort. But the gentleman from Illinois knows that we can not make laws which will apply to every im ginable contingency. You recognize that as well as I do?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Now, we have regulations as to the directors of the national banks. For instance, we have a regulation of the national-bank act as to the directors, that no man shall be a director who does not own $1,000 worth of unencumbered stock in the bank. What was the object of that requirement? To make a responsible director, to make the interests of the director in the bank coincide with his other business interests. Now, when he goes to borrow the money of the bank (and some banks have adopted this rule regardless of this law), he makes his application in writing, and it is put on the minutes of the bank. Those voting "aye" are recorded as such, and those voting "no" on the application are also recorded. The obligation is thus placed on the directory, and the responsibility is upon them, just as was intended by their appointment. There surely can be no objection to that.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman has stated that we can not by legislation meet all exceptions.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, this is my point; you can not make a dishonest man honest by this kind of legislation, and if you attempt to cover a class of directors, presidents, or officers of banks by your legislation they will circumvent it in the manner suggested by my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER], or in some other manner, and the only effect of the legislation will be to impair the operations of honest banks and hamper honest bank officials.

Mr. COX. Now, hold on a minute. When you make that kind of assertion you ought to say who it will affect. Now, who does this hamper?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Why, any restrictions that you apply tend to hamper them.

Mr. COX. Oh, that is a general statement—

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. COX. That is very kind of the gentleman from New

Mr. LOCKWOOD. It hampers in this way. You upset the whole present system of discounting in the national banks throughout the country, so far as the large cities and large banks are concerned. This hampers the bank in another way, that in order to put out a loan to a director or officer of a bank, you have got to get your board together and wait a long enough you have got to get you.

time to do that.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is mistaken.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. You have got to submit your proposition to your board of directors or to your finance committee.

Mr. COX. To the executive committee, in the absence of

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Now, men do not want to borrow money from national banks, as a rule, in large cities, only at the very hour that they want it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is the point exactly.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. When a man has to wait a day or two, which it will take nine times out of ten if this bill passes, the man does not want the money, because the occasion has passed; and although he may come to the bank and put up the best collateral, although he may put up United States bonds, he can not get the money when he wants it. You have destroyed the present banking system, so far as the loaning of money and the discounting of money and the di counting of paper is concerned in large cities, and the banks are hampered as much to day as they can be and make any money for their stockholders.

Mr. COX. I have listened to you very patiently. Will you do the same to me?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I will do it gladly.

Mr. COX. Your proposition is that the objection to the bill lies in the fact that the man who applies for the money can not get it at once. Is not that it? Mr. LOCKWOOD. How is he going to get it until the directors can be called together?

Mr. COX. There is not a well-organized bank in the United States that does not have its executive committee, which meets every day in the week.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I would beg very much to differ with the gentleman. I know a great many banks whose executive committee does not meet oftener than once every three or four or five days. Mr. COX.

Mr. COX. You are talking about your directors.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. No; about the executive or finance committees. That is true of almost every bank in the city of New York and other large cities.

Mr. COX. Who passes on the soundness of the paper?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. The president and cashier, nine times out

Mr. COX. Who are they? Mr. LOCKWOOD. They are officers of the bank, but they

Mr. LOCK WOOD. They are officers of the bank, but they are not the finance committee or executive committee.

Mr. COX. That is the way you get your binks broken. The president and cashier of the bank can combine to discount certain paper and pass it through the bank, and that is the way you break your banks.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Let me ask you a question right there.
Mr. COX. No, wait until I state my point. Take the Fidelity Bank in Cincinnati. What broke it? The cashier, president, and vice-president drew out its funds—just absorbed them. and vice-president drew out its funds—just absorbed them. Take the Spring Garden Bank, in Philadelphia I think it was. We examined that case last winter. What broke that? The president got all the funds. Take the bank in Boston. What broke that? The officers absorbed the funds. Now, does any gentleman mean to say that on account of the question of convenience, the director, cashier, or president of a bank can not be subjected to the largel postniction that the hard hards. subjected to the leg il restriction that when he wants to borrow the money of a bank he shall make his application to the directors and let them know about it?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Right there, if the gentleman will permit me, take those officers ou have mentioned, and if they are bound to get the money of the bank, if they can not get it themselves under the restrictions of a bill of this kind, if they are dishonest, why would not they loan the money to their wives, or their cousins, or their aunts?

Mr. COX. I think I have said enough about the wife question. Now, let me ask you one question. Do you mean to be understood that a director, president, or vice-president of a bank ought to be permitted to absorb the funds of the depositors without putting any restrictions upon him?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. COX. That is exactly the purport of your objection.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No, I recel any such insinuations, and in the cases you have mentioned the men have been sent to the penitentiary

Mr. COX. The Boston gentleman is to-day much more at liberty than the gentleman and myself.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Before I get through on this point, I want to ask you this question: You are passing this law for the benefit of the stockholder, are you not?

Mr. COX. Yes, for the benefit of the stockholder and the de-

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is primarily for the stockholder.

Mr. COX. It is primarily for the depositor. Why, of course, is. I do not think you have caught the force of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I think I understand it perfectly.

Mr. COX. I do not mean to say that in any but the kindest

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the existing law the stock-holders select the board of directors every twelve months.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The stockholders have full power pelect the men who shall control the banks. Why do not you to elect the men who shall control the banks. give them the same power that you do with other corporations, in woolen mills, steel mills, and the like. Why not give the board of directors the power to control the business?

Mr. COX. I do not want to undertake, in answer, to make a financial discussion. Does not the gentleman know that when the Government of the United States charters a corporation that it has a perfect right to put restrictions upon its administration? Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am not disputing that.

Mr. COX. That is all I am doing—to make your directors, presidents, and vice-presidents act honestly.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HEARD. Will the gettleman allow mer
Mr. COX. Certuinly.
Mr. HEARD. The object of this bill is to limit the opportunities of these officers to steal, if they should not be honest.
Mr. COX. Exactly.

Mr. COX. Exactly.
Mr. HEARD. I want to say further, that if all these banks' boards of discount do not meet often enough it is no hardship to require them to have the necessary meetings. They can genrequire them to have the necessary meetings. They can generally very easily manage to have their executive committee meet to pass upon paper, and they ought to do it for the security of their depositors.

Mr. Lockwood addressed the Chair.
Mr. COX. I have got the floor. Let me say to my friend there
I am connected with a bank, and a nation d bank, in a little town of 3,000 inhabitants, and when the gentleman talks about his big banks and that they can not hold meetings I will tell you how we manage it. When the cashier has a note presented to him for discount he sends out and gets three members of the executive committee, submits it to the committee, and they pass upon it.
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But you could not do that in a city like Buffalo or Chicago.

Mr. COX. Do you mean to say that in the larger cities there are more opportunities for dishonesty?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Not at all. You take a bank like the First National Bank of Chicago and you can not have these meetings.

Mr. COX. Can not you get three of the board together? Why I venture the assertion that your president is not out of the bank ten hours out of the twenty-four.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I want to make the suggestion that it is not an easy matter in cities to get the directors of a bank to meet to pass upon a piece of paper like that.

Mr. COX. Do they not require meetings of the directors regularly in the city binks?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. It is not an easy matter to get the directors of a bank together, and I undertake to say right here that if you were to compel three of these directors, as a financial committee, to meet and pass upon every note, as you say you do in your bank, you could not get them together; you could not get a director of a national bank in the city of New York, or in the city in which I live.

Mr. COX. Just wait one moment—

Mr. LOCKWOOD. They could not spare the time.

Mr. COX. And you can not fail to see when I tell you how it works. Suppose a man goes there and makes an application for a loan. It may be that he will have to have it at once, at that a loan. It may be that he will have to mave to hour. The cashier of the bank sends out for the executive committee, calls the executive committee together-

Mr. LOCKWOOD. We have got no executive committee.
Mr. COX. Or, he sends for a majority of the directors and lays the paper before them.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. They may be 10 miles away, and he can not get them. They have other business that they are attending to. They may be in New York or in Philadelphia.
Mr. COX. Then do you think that the depositors should run the risk of losing their money for the accommodation of the of-ficers of the bank?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Who has any more interest than the president? He is the largest stockholder in the bank and liable not only for the amount of his stock, but for an equal amount in excess of that.

The man most interested in the bank is the depos-itor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.
Mr. BINGHAM. What paragraph of this bill includes direc-

Mr. COX. I think the original language of the bill included them, but they are now included by amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, I want to put this practical proposition to the gentleman—Mr. COX. That is right. That is the kind of question I like.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am a director of a bank—

Mr. COX. So was I, until sent here.
Mr. BINGHAM. I do not say that I am personally; but I am simply putting my proposition in that way.

Mr. COX. Well, I was a director of a bank.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am a director of a bank and I am also a stockbroker, doing a large stockbroking business. The mar-ket is an active market. At 1 or 2 o'clock in the day my customers come in and buy large amounts of stocks and sell large amounts of stocks. Between 2 and half past 2 o clock I have to take the securities that I have bought for my customers on a margin (the universal way of doing such business) and go to the banks and borrow $100,000, $200,000, $30,000, often larger amounts, for which I give the best gilt-edged collateral in the market. Now, how am I to do that business if I have to wait for a quorum. Three o'clock comes, and if I have not placed my stock and secured my customers and covered my margins, what am I to do? I put that to the gentleman as a business proposition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Stop stock gambling. [Laughter.]
Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, it is not stock gambling. I have described a very ordinary transaction in New York, or Philadelphia, or Chicago, or any of the other large cities where such transactions often cover millions of dollars.

Mr. COX. I am aware of that. But what ought that man to do, that broker who wanted the money, and what ought the eishier to do in a good solvent, well-regulated bank? When the broker comes and makes his application for a loan to meet the transactions of the day, they ought to get the executive board together; and I never saw a bank in my life, even in the rural districts, where you could not get an executive board of two members together.

Mr. BINGHAM. You can not do it in the great cities.

Mr. COX. Why not?

Mr. BINGHAM. Because the men are engaged in their regular vocations. A directorship in a bank is not a paying employment.

Mr. COX. Is not banking a vocation?

Mr. BINGHAM. A director is paid no salary.

Mr. COX. He gets his salary in the way of dividends and

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the interest upon his money.
Mr. COX. Can you tell me of any case where they could not get two members of the board together?

Mr. BINGHAM. I say they do not do it.

Mr. COX. Oh, I know they do not do it; but could they not

Mr. LANE. They can make their president and a clerk their executive committee Mr. BINGHAM. Supposing they disagree?

Mr. LANE. Suppose any committee disagree? Mr. WADSWORTH. If any of those men are dishonest you are left just where you are now.

Mr. COX. Except that when the president or cashier goes to

Mr. WADSWORTH. He acts on his own loan.
Mr. COX. No. The application is filed in the minutes and it is known. Before I pass from the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], I want to say that I have never heard of a national bank president being engaged in the brokerage business. It would be a very suspicious circumstance to find one so engaged.
Mr. BINGHAM. To find a director of a bank in the brokerage business?

business?

Mr. COX. No; the president of a bank. Mr. MEYER. Would not the provisions of this bill be prohibitory for a gentleman circumstanced as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has described? Could be obtain any lo in at all if he should have the misfortune to be a director of the bank?

Mr. COX. Oh, no. It is not intended to prohibit him from obtaining a loan.

Mr. MEYER. He might make a loan, but he could not pos sibly be permitted to overdraw, no matter how good his collat-Mr. COX. And that is exactly right. No officer of a bank should be permitted to overdraw.

Mr. MEYER. But is it not apparent that the director of a bank has no executive functions? His function is merely adbank has no executive intections. His function is merely atvisory, and that being so, why should he, if he is a client of the bank, be treated worse because he happens to be a director than any ordinary patron of the bank would be treated?

Mr. COX. There is no reason except that he is a trustee under the law. Every court in the United States has decided that he is a trustee or a quasi trustee. Now, when he comes to borrow he makes his application in writing, and there is a record of it. The only difference between the manner of dealing with him and the manner of dealing with any other patron of the bank is that his application is brought home to the knowledge of the directors. And it is done privately. Nobody knows about it but them.

And when gentlemen reflect a moment on what has happened in banking matters within the last six or eight months they must recognize that this is one of the wisest provisions that can be incorporated in our laws. And it will not hurt anybody in the world who is trying to be honest.

Mr. MEYER. I agree with the gentleman that every safeguard should be thrown around the operations of our banks; but it seems to me that this bill, in the proper and natural construction of its language, will discriminate against a man simply because he is a director of the bank.

Mr. COX. We do not undertake to do anything of that kind.

Mr. MEYER. It absolutely prohibits a director from arranging for an overdraft by the deposit of securities which would be accepted from an ordinary customer of the bank. Allow me to read that portion of the bill.
Mr. COX. The gentlems

Mr. COX. The gentleman need not do so. The provision simply is that wherever an officer of the bank is concerned he can not overdraw.

Mr. MEYER. Allow me to read from page 2, beginning at

No such association shall permitits president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its directors, or any of its clerks, tellers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ to become liable to it by reason of over-drawn account.

That is what I stated-that no director or other Mr. COX.

officer is allowed to make an overdraft.

Mr. MEYER. But suppose a broker, who happens to be a director of the bank, finds himself toward the close of the day in want of a large amount of money, as has been illustrated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He goes to the bank and asks permission to overdraw, but though he may offer to deposit collateral securities the value of which is twice the amount of the lateral securities the value of which is twice the amount of the proposed overdraft, yet under this clause he is prohibited under such circumstances from securing the overdraft.

Mr. COX. Why is that so?

Mr. MEYER. Because the provision distinctly states—

Mr. COX. I am asking the gentleman as to the reason of the provision. His conclusion in regard to the construction of this bill is right; the column to provision when the construction of the state of the construction of the state of the column to the construction of the state of the column to the construction of the column to the construction of bill is right; the only controversy between him and myself is whether the proposition of the bill is right or wrong. I say it is right. When the man overdraws, whose money does he get from the bank? As a rule it is the money of the depositors; and the directors have the custody of that money as trustees. why should we confer upon an officer of the bank the power of absorbing the funds of innocent depositors upon whose money the bank is making its profits?

Mr. BINGHAM. Why does not the gentleman extend the provision to stockholders as well as directors?

Mr. COX. Why, sir, the stockholder, unless he is a director of the bank, has but one function to perform, and that is to vote for directors.

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree to that proposition; yet the stockholder of a bank generally has a larger privilege than the ordinary borrower.

Mr. COX. But the stockholder is not a trustee for the depositors of the bank.
Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; he always is.

Mr. COX. The stockholder?
Mr. BINGHAM. If I am a stockholder of a bank, I have a closer relation with the bank than the mere depositor.

Mr. COX. The law has settled the proposition that so far as the directors are concerned they are quasi trustees for the bank. Who ever heard of a stockholder being regarded as a trustee for the bank? If that were so, I would not be a stockholder of any bank on earth. The stockholder delegates his power to the di rector of the bank, and that is the end of his function in the matter. Now the object of the law is that when the director assumes his duties as such he shall not abuse them.

Mr. BINGHAM. One question. The gentleman has had banking experience as he states

Mr. COX. Not much.
Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not a fact that if I am a large stockholder in a bank of which you are a director, you are more disposed to discount my notes than the notes of a man who is not a stockholder? Is not that a fact in practical life?
Mr. COX. I think that is true; but I think that is one of the evils of the present system.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is human nature.

Mr. COX. Human nature is pretty bad in some respects and pretty good in others. Our personal interests generally control us in matters of that sort. I concede that when a man owns the majority of the stock he has power to elect himself a director or other officer, and in this way may exercise great power. Now, if we put no restrictions on him by law, what becomes of the interests of the depositors?

Mr. BAILEY. No person, under the existing law, can borrow more than 10 per cent of the capital stock of the bank.
Mr. COX. That is a fact. But one person may own nine-tenths of the stock. Now, suppose a stockholder elects himself as a director, and by means of his power as an officer makes a big loan to himself, where is the security for your depositors?

Mr. BINGHAM. The matter would be disposed of according to the regular rule.

Mr. COX. The regular rule, as we propose now to make it, will be that he shall make his application regularly, so that the minutes of the bank will show what has become of the money. And the history of national banks in this country shows that in two-thirds of the cases where they have become insolvent the money has been stolen by the officers.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not quite as large a percentage as that.
Mr. COX. Well, the Comptroller says about two-thirds.
Mr. HALL of Missouri. The Comptroller says in almost every instance

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, my object in presenting this bill I have explained sufficiently and clearly—
Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?
Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that in almost every instance where a bank becomes insolvent the officers have violated the law on the statute books? Is not that the case in nearly every instance?

Mr. COX. I answer affirmatively; for here to-day, in this crisis, there is hardly a national bank officer in the United States that is not indictable for violation of the law.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is now half past 4 o'clock, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, and it is evident he can not complete the bill to-night. I suggest that, if it with his gentleman here were a vident here. if it suits his convenience, he move an adjournment and let this matter come up to-morrow.

Mr. COX. I am perfectly willing to be governed by the judg-

Mr. COX. I am ment of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will make the motion if the gentleman does not desire to do it.

Mr. COX. Personally I have no objection, but I hear some objection from other members around me. Still, it looks to me as if we ought to dispose of this bill in a few minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems to me that you can not complete it to-night. I wish to yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] and other gentlemen, and it is now, as I have said, half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. You might go on for an hour longer this evening.

Mr. COX. I submit to the gentleman that to-morrow we will take a vote on the bill at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I do not know. A discussion of the matter may make us desire not to vote on it at that time. The morning hour may consume a considerable length of time. Of course the gentleman has it in his power to call the previous question at any time that he chooses.

Mr. COX. I do not desire to cut any one off. I think the discussion will strengthen the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I think we could be approximated to be a control of the sense of the House I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I think we ought to go on until 5 o'clock at least. The motion of Mr. CANNON of Illinois was rejected. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a few minutes I think I can get

I have certainly no desire to antagonize any legislation that will amend the law where it is now at fault. But while that is true, I submit to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no legislation that will keep a thief from stealing provided he has the opportunity to steal; and I submit further to him that the national-bank law as it now stands is quite sufficient, and the penalties are quite sufficient, to secure, first, the depositors, and secondly, the stockholders, against loss, provided the law is complied with, and that a failure to comply with the law will, if the law be enforced, now subject the officer or director to punishment. But, sir, the objection I have to this legislation, the objection that occurs to my mind is that it will not be any more effective in protecting the public than the present law, while at the same time it will embarrass honest men in the prosecution of the ordinary business affairs of the country.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand your objection is this, that the present laws, if lived up to, are sufficient to protect the bank?
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.
Mr. BRYAN. And that when the law says a bank shall not loan more than a certain amount of its deposits, that that affords a sufficient protection to the depositors?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.
Mr. BRYAN. Then what is the use of having an examination of the banks by an officer of the Government authorized by law to make such examination to see if the officers live up to the

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Ah! but that is a matter of administration.

Mr. BRYAN. Is not this in the same line? Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No, this is not a matter of administration, but of legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. But is it not enacted for the same purpose that bank examinations are ordered, to compel the officers of the bank to live up to the law?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No; this is making additional law.

They have laws already on the statute books which protect the banks and the depositors.

Now, I think the law, as I said before, is quite sufficient. Let me refer to that for a moment. A national bank is organized and the stock is taken and paid for. The stockholder becomes liable to every depositor to the amount of his stock and as much more. Then the stockholders meet and they create the direc-tory, and the directors, after their election, create the officers of the bank.

Now, I undertake to say that in the case of the Fidelity Bank of Cincinnati, in the case of the Spring Garden Bank, and in the case of the Boston bank, the parties have been indicted and convicted, and lately were or now are in the penitentiary.

Mr. COX. In the case of the Boston bank the president has been acquitted, and is as clear and clean of any difficulty as you or I.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My recollection was that some of the officers of that bank were convicted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Did not Secretary Carlisle make a thorough examination into that case?

Mr. COX. No; the examination of that bank was made by the Committee on Banking and Currency in the last Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Did not Secretary Carlisle go there?

Mr. COX. Why, no; the bank was broken, and the whole thing occurred before Mr. Carlisle went into office.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not as Secretary of the Treasury, but did he not go there in connection with the matter?

Mr. COX. I have stated my understanding of the matter?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My recollection was that the officers of that bank had been convicted; but let that be as it may, no breach of trust or theft in one case or a dozen cases is sufficient excuse for a general rule covering between four and five thousand banks, and covering substantially the banking busi-ness of a country of 65,000,000 of people. The bill-holder is always secure in case of failure, and the depositor is almost invariably secure. Very rarely indeed does the depositor lose a dollar. So far as I know, during this present almost unexampled depression the depositors of failed banks either have been or depression the depositors of failed banks either have been or are to be paid in full.

Mr. COX. Let me direct the attention of the gentleman to the point. It is conceded, so far as the bill-holder is concerned, that he is protected under our laws. Now you come to the depositor, and how do you make his deposit good? It is by an assessment on the stockholders, who are liable for the amount of stock hydroribed, and for a require appears besides.

stock subscribed, and for an equal amount besides.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. COX. Now, here are a number of stockholders, fifty or a hundred of them, entirely outside, who have no connection with the actual conduct of the business of the bank. The president and directors run that. Now, suppose the cashier of the bank steals the money. I call it stealing because that is about as good a word as I know of—

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. COX. You make your assessment on these stockholders who have nothing to do with the conduct of the business, and that is the way you make the depositors good? Now, my proposition is to cut off the president, vice-president, cashier, and other officers from the chance to steal under the form of loaning the money to themselves without the directors knowing any thing about it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman's proposition is to enact this legislation for the benefit of the stockholder. The bill-holder is secured.

Mr. COX. And the depositor, in the way I have stated.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The depositor is secured—
Mr. BRYAN. How?
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. He is secured first by the ca

He is secured first by the capital, second by the surplus, and third by an assessment on the stockbolders equal to the amount of their stock.

Mr. BRYAN. Take the case in our city, where the stock was owned largely by the president and cashier, and where the president took the money. After he took it his stock was worthless, because he had borrowed more than the amount of his stock, or rather taken it from the bank, and he was not good for any part of the 100 per cent, because nothing could be collected from him; and instead of the $300,000 nominal capital being there as security for the depositors, the men who had borrowed the money from the bank being themselves the holders of the stock, when you could not collect their debts from them you could not collect the extra hundred per cent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Has there been any loss to the de-positors of that bank?

Mr. BRYAN. They have been paid 10 per cent, so far. We

Mr. BRYAN. They have been paid 10 per cent, so far. We do not know what else they will get.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman knows whether the understanding is that they will be paid or not?
Mr. BRYAN. It is not expected that they will be paid in full. Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is not expected that they will get 25 per cent of their deposits.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What was the capital of that bank? Mr. BRYAN. Three hundred thousand dollars.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman has stated one case where he says there is doubt whether the depositors will be paid or not. That is one bank, with $300,000 capital; but there are between four thousand and five thousand banks scattered throughout the length and breadth of the country, and because there out the length and breadth of the country, and because there was a theft in the one bank that he speaks of he would apply was a their in the one cank that he speaks of he would apply rules, which it seems to me are onerous, to the whole banking business of the country, while, it makes no difference how onerous the rules may be made, if the man was a thief he would steal the money and cheat the depositors; and you might pile Pelion on Ossa, and the thief will still steal. In the mean time the honest men, who constitute nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand, and more, are to be embarrassed constantly in the transaction of the husiness of the country.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gent'eman answer me this question?
Is not that true in every other department. Do not we compel men to put their deeds and mortgages upon record to protect

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly; the record of instruments constitutes notice in the absence of pedal possession.

Mr. COX. The Comptroller himself states that nearly every one of the broken national banks has been broken by stealing the funds of the bank.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Precisely; but where one cent has

Mr. BRYAN. Something like $10,000,000 has been lost to de-positors since national banks were organized.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not aware of the amount: but even that is a very small loss, indeed, when you consider that there are several billions of deposits, active deposits, for over thirty years.

Mr. SPRINGER. Two billions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Two billions.
Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon.
Mr. SPRINGER. One billion nine hundred million.
Mr. BRYAN. Is it not well to protect against that?
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say further, Mr. Speaker, if I can have attention of the House—
Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to as him a question if it is not an interruption?
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is no interruption. I will answer the gentleman's question.

swer the gentleman's question.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I do not know that it will be exactly germane to this bill. Would it not be a good thing that one-half of 1 per cent paid to national banks shall be deposited as a protection to the depositors, in the event that the bank should

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman now specks of a proposition which it seems to me might well be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency; one that would be good in its operation.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will allow me to say that it is considering it; but this bill has nothing on the earth to do with

Mr. BAILEY. That is a guaranty business.

Mr. COX. That is the guaranty business.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, who makes the director? The stockholder. He is the creator. The director

I hope the gentle-the bank. It is the may be a large stockholder or a small one. I hope the man sees the point, if he wants to protect the bank. duty of the stockholder to look after his business, to look after his bank, and to look after his directory.

Mr. COX. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but he will

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not criticising the bill, except in a friendly spirit, as to what I fear would be the operation of the bill.

Mr. COX. Now, you say let the stockholder look after his bank. Let me say to you that is what this bill means. Here is a man who has put his money in the bank in good faith, and we say he has the right to turn to the minutes and see what is contained there. He does so, and he sees that the directors are When he sees that he begins to be susborrowing the money. picious, and if you do not confer this power and authority by this bill there is no record in the minutes of the bank and the stockholder never sees the directors are borrowing the money. The very thing you are talking about I am trying to reach.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think I have an idea of a stockholder of a bank. He has not only a duty to perform, but he has a right to be informed of the condition of his bank. It is his duty to meet and to learn the condition of the bank annually; to make a complete and full examination of all the papers, and the condition of the bank. Now, the gentleman speaks about the conduct of the country banks. I do not think they would be very greatly embarrassed by this legislation. It is true that, 85 far as I know, but few country banks have what is known as executive committees or a board of discounts.

Mr. COX. Most all of them.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. They have not in my section of the country, though they may have them in the gentleman's section of the country. They generally pick out a man for president who is a prudent and cautious man, connected with the bank, to look after it. He is presumed to be honest, and he is generally, really and fairly, able to understand the credit of the people who apply for money. He acts in a minute, and can yes or no. He can say in a minute whether he will discount a note. It is not a question of a day or a week, it is not a question of a written application, not to be laid before the board of directors, but it is "yea" or "no." yes" or "no."

And it that bank retains its business, it must necessarily be yes "or "no" at the time the application is made. Otherwise, in the sharp competition that exists, the competing bank gets the business. But so far as the country banks are concerned. I do not see that they are to be much embarrassed by this legislation. Some friction no doubt it would beget. Where a director would desire a discount, if he needed it to-day he might have to wait until to-morrow, or for two days, or until next week, or he might go to the rival bank or somewhere else and make his discount, because he could not afford to wait.

But I do believe that this legislation would cause very great difficulty in places where large amounts of business are done. I live some 125 miles south of Chicago. I know something of the way business is conducted in that city, and it is substantially the same as in Buffalo, New York, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and other large business centers. In those places the transactions are very large, and if any officer or all the officers of a bank, or anybody in the employ of a bank, or every director of a bank, before he can get an accommodation, must make application in writing, stating what the security is, and if then the executive board or the board of directors must meet and pass upon that application, after consideration, must pass upon it by a yea-and-nay vote which is to be spread upon the record before the discount can be had, I undertake to say that there is no bank in any great financial center that will make the discounts it ought to make to its customers in the ordinary course of business least to such of its customers as happen to be directors of the bank or in its employ.

Mr. COX. The bill does not require that when the application is made to the executive board it shall be approved by the The executive board makes its report of the applidirectors. cation to the directors and a record is made of the transaction. Now, I venture to say that you can not find a bank in Chicago that has not an executive board that can be got together in fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have some little practical knowledge about the way such things are done in the Chicago banks; not a great deal, for I am not a banker, but I have done more or less banking business.

A MEMBER. On the other side of the counter.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes; on the other side of the counter, as the gentleman says. I have borrowed money in Chicago and I may do so again.

A MEMBER. You can't do it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have borrowed at times larger sums than I could borrow on my individual credit. How did I do it? I stepped into one of those great banks and said, "I have such and such security as collateral and want so much money," and I always got my answer at once. Applications for accommodation do not wait the action of boards of directors day after day

Mr. SPRINGER. Your collaterals were good. That is what helped you out. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes; the security was good. the gentleman [Mr. Cox] says now that a man who is in the employ of any of these banks, or who is a director in a bank, shall not have that privilege. All I have to say is that, in my shall not have that privilege. All I have to say is that, in my opinion, this legislation will drive away those people who are desirable as customers of those banks and will send their business to rival banks in which they have no interest, or will drive them out of any connection with the banks.

In the mean time the gentleman may enact his law, he may put in the strongest safeguards and penalties that he can discover, and after he has made them tenfold stronger than his bill proposes to make them, he will be exactly where he started. That is, if a thief gets into a position of trust or profit he will steal and take the chances, as such men have done in the past. But you say he will go to the penitentiary. Well, so he will under the present law. And while the thief will continue to steal, this legislation will embarrass the legitimate business of

We have a Comptroller of the Currency who has ample powers now, and let me say that in the main the representative Comptrollers of the Currency who have filled that great office have been valuable and efficient officers, commencing with Hugh McCullough and including the present incumbent of the office, one of the most valuable Comptrollers, in my opinion, so far as Lam able to judge, that we have had. The law is sufficient now, in my opinion, judge, that we have had. The law is sufficient now, in my opinion, for this purpose, and he is executing it. The law is sufficient to give him knowledge of whether any bank is good or bad. He can have the form of the reports changed in order to get more information. He has added to the requirements of such reports.

The banks are now required to report five times a year, there must be a definite report as to the very kind of liability which the gentleman seeks to reach by this provision. There is no question in the world that the Comptroller has the right now, under existing law, to require a report upon that point, and he may go further and require it to be published if he chooses. see no objection to the publication, and it seems to me that the Comptroller of the Currency, in a wise administration of the law,

In addition to that, he sends out his bank examiners at least once a year; and he can call from time to time for special reports. What we want is a thorough, vigilant administration of the law. I do not aim to cast stones at anybody who has held that great office of Comptroller of the Currency. I say again that in the main the administration of that office has been wise; and in my judgment it is wise now. Mr. HALL of Missouri. Will th

Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? Mr. CANNO

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. As I understand, the gentleman has no criticism to offer upon this bill except that it tends to embarrass the directors or other officers of the bank in obtaining ordinary loans from the bank.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That it tends to embarrass the ordinary business of the country.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Now, the provision of which the gentleman complains will not affect anyone except the directors or other officers. These persons being alone subjected to the operation of this proposed law, does not the gentleman think it wise to have a provision of this kind so that these bank officers may know that when they want to borrow money they must make written application two days beforehand?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have just stated in substance that no man doing a great business in a city like Chicago, in the stock market or on the board of trade, or in dry goods, in wheat, in corn, or a thousand other products, can tell two days beforehand what amount of money he may need to transact his business on a given day.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Conceding that this limitation will impose some inconvenience upon this single class of people—the directors or other officers of the bank—suppose there may be some little inconvenience to them in requiring this written application for a loan to be made two days beforehand—will not this inconvenience be counterbalanced by the good that may spring from such a safeguard, especially in view of the fact stated by the Comptroller of the Currency in his report that in almost every instance the investigation of the affairs of an insolvent bank has disclosed the fact that the directors or other officers have too freely used the funds of the bank for their own purposes? Is it not wise for us to impose this requirement upon these comparatively few individuals in order that we may protect the mil-lions of stockholders and depositors?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In my judgment, no; because the provision will not secure the protection which is sought. There has not been a word, so far as I have been able to find, from the present Comptroller of the Currency recommending the passage of this bill. During the recent panic and depression that officer has had wonderfully grave and onerous duties to perform. He has not yet made his report. You bring in here a bill of this kind without a word of commendation or recommendation from him in favor of its passage. So far as I know, it does not appear to have been referred to him.

Preceding Comptrollers did recommend it.

Mr. COX. Preceding Comptrollers did recommend it.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, the whole burden of the song in favor of this measure—the only practical reason offered in its favor-is that it is calculated to protect, not the bill-holder, not the depositor, but the stockholder.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. The stockholder and the depositor.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The depositor is substantially protected anyhow. It has been stated here that during thirty years, with all the enormous deposits which have been made during with all the enormous deposits which have been made during that time, the whole loss to depositors has been only $10,000,000. I have not looked into the matter, but it seems to me probable that the real amount is less than that.

Mr. BRYAN. Just a little less.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let that be as it may, the amount of loss to the depositors has been comparatively very small. There has been a much larger amount of loss, no doubt to the stockholders whose stock has been swept away by the failure of banking institutions, and who, besides, have had to nay assessed. banking institutions, and who, besides, have had to pay assess-

Mr. COX. Let me ask the gentleman who got that ten millions of the depositors' money?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I really do not know. Mr. COX. About eight millions of it went to the officers of the banks, and that is just what we are now trying to prevent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And the officers of the banks, in banks, in the main, went to the penitentiary. And so they would again if you amend the law. I think that is a sufficient answer. You make the law to catch a thief, and you embarrass honest men and do not prevent the thief from pursuing his operations. the trouble.

Mr. COX. If it will suit the gentleman from Illinois to conclude his remarks in the morning, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That will suit me very well, and I will yield for that motion.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 17, 1893.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday a proceedings was read.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I rise to suggest some inaccuracies in the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday. There are, in my judgment, numerous inaccuracies. One I will call attention to, found on page 2545 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Presiding Officer. The Senator from Montana suggests the want of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to

The names follow, which I will not read.

The Presiding Officer. Forty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present.

I think that is incorrect. It is true there were but forty-two Senators who answered to their names, but there were more than forty-two Senators present in the Chamber—more than a quorum here.

At6:30 last evening, when the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] suggested the lack of a quorum, stating that there were but 31 Senators present, the Presiding Officer stated, after the roll call:

Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Sen-

Forty-two senators have shawered to their mainers and at is not present.

Mr. VOORBEES, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr FRYE, and Mr. MARTIN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Then I offered the following order:

Then I offered the following order:

Mr. Dolph. I desire to offer an order for the action of the Senate.

The Presidence Officer. The proposed order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Whereas on the call of the Senate just had Senators Allen and Kyle were present in the Senate Chamber and did not answer when their names were called; and whereas they are still present:

"Ordered, That the names of said Senators Allen and Kyle be recorded in connection with said roll call to show their presence."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] said:

I suppose that under the rules of the Senate a Senator who does not answer his name upon a call of the roll is absent. I do not know of any reason why my distinguished friend should select me and the Senator from South Dakota as the objects of his displeasure.

It is sufficient to state that the Chair ruled that this was a res olution which must go over under objection. I did not think so, I thoughtit was an order and pertained to that relicall, and must necessarily be considered, if at all, in connection with it. But it has gone over one day; and I now raise the point of order that the Journal is incorrect in not showing the presence of the Senators named in the preamble of the order, whose names I asked to have entered; the remark of at least one of the Senators named, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], showing he was still in the Senate Chamber

Mr. President, the business of the Senate presents to the country an extraordinary spectacle. We were summoned on the 7th of August by the President of the United States to deal with the question of the purchase of silver bullion and asked to repeal the purchasing clause of what is known as the Sherman act.

Mr. MORGAN. And to deal with the tariff.
Mr. DOLPH. Very little was said about the tariff. The tariff was relegated to the rear. We have been in session over ten weeks, with a Democratic majority. We have twenty-six Senators on this side of the Chamber who are understood to be in favor of repealing the purchasing clause of that act, and are ready to follow the chairman of the Finance Committee in any measure suggested to bring a vote upon the question. us have been up without sleep for from thirty to thirty-six hours at one time, and we have held extraordinarily long sessions of the Senate and have been unable to reach a vote. It has become apparent that if Senators can talk indefinitely, if they can read from books and read newspaper articles without limit, and the Senators to a vote the product of the senators are to be senated by the senators are to be senators. ate is not to amend its rules or to put some different construction on its present rules than has heretofore been placed upon them, we must drift down the current of endless talk without accomplishing any result.

I think I may say for the great majority of the twenty-six Senators on this side of the Chamber who are in favor of repeal-ing the purchasing clause of the Sherman act that they would be willing to vote and to cooperate with the political majority in the Senate to secure some rule to limit debate, notwithstanding it may happen that such a rule might work against them in measures which may come up at the present session of Congress to which they are not committed and which they do not favor.

Mr. President, look at the ridiculous position the Senate occupies before the country. A Senator will rise in his place in this Chamber and suggest the lack of a quorum. Immediately a roll call is ordered, and he and others do not answer to their names, and the Presiding Officer announces that no quorum is present, although there is a quorum. The Senators are in their seats, as is obvious to every Senator on the floor. Then, as there is no quorum announced as present, the chairman of the Committee on Finance rises and moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. Why, what a farce, when there are enough Senators in the Chamber and present who do not answer to their names to make a quorum, to sind the Sergeant-at-Arms out to request the attendance of absent Senators

What a ridiculous position the Senate occupies in sending out the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators when it will not insist that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall use the force necessary to bring Senators to the bar of the Sen

Go a step further. Suppose he brings them. Suppose we direct the Sergeunt-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. Suppose they refuse to obey the request and we au-thorize him to bring them in, and he brings them in, and they stand here mute before the Senate and refuse to answer to their names or to vote, and the Senate takes no steps to deal with them.

Mr. President, that is disorderly conduct. It is a violation of the spirit of the rules of the Senate. That course is bringing the Senate into disrepute in the country and bringing scandal upon the Senate. I am myself getting very tired of this sort of thing. I think it is about time that the Senate shall show a little backbone, because it has never had any on such questions. tions. Since I have been here it never has had any. If a Senator refuses to vote, let him be dealt with. If a Senator refuses to answer a roll call of the Senate, then I think it is the duty of the Chair to order his name entered; and at the very first good opportunity I have I shall so move, and if the Chair does not order it I shall appeal to the Senate and have a vote. If Senators are present and do not vote, I think it is the right of the Senate to order it. And now, upon the question of the approval of the Journal, I ask that my order of yesterday be considered, so that the question as to who were present on that roll call may be determined before the Journal is approved.

Mr. HARRIS. I am sorry the Senator from Oregon is tired, and being tired I think the best remedy would be to sit down and rest. [Laughter.] It would be a relief to him and to the

Now, the scolding of this morning and criticism of the Journal is not merited by any existing fact. The Journal recites the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday and recites them accurately. The whole point of the Senator's discussion is that in violation of the rules of this body the Presiding Officer shall, regardless of the roll call, look around, hunt up, and see if he can not count somebody whom the roll call does not show has answered. When the Senate determines that the Presiding Officer shall look over the body and count for himself to ascertain who is here and who is not here, make your rules that way, and the Presiding Officer will doubtless execute them, whosever he may be; but until some rule authorizes that proceeding the Senator from Oregon and the rest of the world had just as well recognize the fact that no man who will ever occupy that chair will assume any such authority

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I have often wondered what would become of the Senate and the country if the Senator from Tennessee should happen to die. He supposes that he embodies all knowledge on parliamentary subjects and almost everything in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. That will largely depend upon whether the

Mr. HARRIS. That will largely depend upon whether the Senator from Oregon will survive.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit this morning with as much grace as possible to the correction which has been administered by the venerable Senator. The present proposition is not that the Chair venerable Senator. The present proposition is not that the Chair shall count members to make a quorum. The present proposition of mine is that my order of yesterday is in order before the minutes are approved, and that the Senate itself can order that those Senators who were on the floor, as the RECORD shows they were, those Senators who everybody knows were on the floor at the time the roll call was had, shall not be entered as having responded to the roll call, but that their names shall be entered in the record in connection with the roll call to show that they were present. That is all there is of it; and it is a matter which the Senate has a right to decide upon.

were present. That is all there is of it; and it is a matter which the Senate has a right to decide upon.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that the Senator from Oregon has had a little tough experience on that line in the past. I should be very glad to ask him if he did not once try to induce some newspaper men to answer questions.

Mr. DOLPH. Unless the Senator wants me to violate the rules of the Senator had better not each tree in public to do see rules of the Senate he had better not ask me in public to do so.

The matter to which he refers was executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all; it was discussed in open session.

Mr. DOLPH. I think not. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think the Senator is talking about something he should not talk about in open session. I never claimed that the Senate had any backbone. That is not the first instance in which the Senate has shown it had no backbone. They authorized me to proceed and then backed squarely down.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no desire to violate any of the rules about secret sessions, but my recollection is that that matter was discussed in open session. The Senator from Oregon showed a good deal of backbone at that time, but his backbone gave way, and I think his backbone will give way now when he attempts to coerce a brother Senator on this floor to conform to his arbitrary rule. There is no authority in the Presiding Officer and there is no authority in the Senate to do what he wants done and when the tries are supported by the tries are supported by the support of the senate to do what he wants to the support of the senate to do what he wants to support of the support of t done; and when he tries to accomplish that purpose I think the session will be prolonged very much beyond a reasonable limit. It is quite unnecessary for the Senator to get up and lecture Senators upon this floor who are at least his equals so far as the Senate is concerned. When he attempts to apply the lash and to apply arbitrary rules he will find resistance in a quarter where he least expects it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief Mr. FAULKNER. Task unanimous consent to make a orientestatement of the parliamentary position of the question now presented to the Chair, as I was in the chair at the time the ruling was made to which the Senator from Oregon refers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from West Virginia. Mr. FAULKNER.

As I understand the Senator from Oregon, he presents the question, first, that the Journal should be cor rected, because of an inaccuracy which appears upon the face of it as to facts which took place in yesterday's session. In order to sustain a correction of the Journal, he must show that facts are not accurately stated in the Journal; and in order to show that he must convince the Presiding Officer and the Senate, on a motion to correct the Journal, that it was the duty of the Chair to act upon the suggestion made yesterday evening that two persons occupying the positions of Senators upon this floor were present in the Chamber when the roll was called and did not answer to their names, and that under the rules of the Senate it was the duty of the Presiding Officer to have the names of those Senators recorded as present and to count them as a part of the Senators present so as to constitute a quorum.

Sir, there can be no belief in the mind of a single Senator here, I am satisfied there is no belief in the mind of the Senator from Oregon at this moment, that there is power in the Presiding Officer under the present rules of the Senate to count a Senator as present who fails and refuses to answer to his nume.

Mr. DOLPH. That was not the precise proposition. I had not asserted that power. My proposition was that the Senate having its attention called at the time to the fact should order it done, not the Presiding Officer. The Senate itself can do many things the Presiding Officer can not do. If it is not to change the rules and is in order, the Senate can at any time pass on the question and at least direct the names to be entered on the Journal, just as it could make a rule on that subject.

nat. Just as it could make a rule on that subject.

Mr. FAULKNER. The correctness of the ruling of the Chair is of course admitted. He has no power under the rules to count a quorum by counting Senators who failed and refused to answer to their names. Consequently there is no error there.

Now, the Senator claims that under the resolution which he offered it was then the duty of the Chair to submit that resolution at that time to the Senate and ask the Senate to pass upon the question whether it was proper that the names of those Senators should be entered on the Journal and counted so as to make a quorum. If there is no rule that justifies the counting of Senators under these circumstances, was not the Chair cor-rect in his ruling that under a resolution of that character it must under objection go over until the next morning?

If that ruling is correct and the resolution goes over by all rules until the next morning, I suggest the point of order to the Chair whether this even is the time when the resolution can be considered. All resolutions that go over under objection from one day to another under the rules of the Senate can not be laid before the Senate until after the morning business is completed. Consequently as it is in the form of a resolution and was properly subject to an objection, as I think there can be no question whatever, because it necessarily must amend and add to the present rules of the Senate, it can not be in order now

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose the Senator will admit that if it is to be considered at all, to have any practical effect it must be considered now, before the minutes are approved, because if considered afterwards it would be futile.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not admit any such proposition for the simple reason that I claim if the resolution is adopted by the Senate it changes the rules of the Senate. It introduces a new feature into our rules which has never had any place there heretofore. Consequently it was properly sent over until to-day under objection, and having gone over under objection it can not be even laid before the Senate for consideration until after the morning business.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from West Virginia will allow me to suggest as an additional objection, that if this paper means anything the Senator is quite right in assuming that it means a change of the rules. Rule XL expressly provides that one day's written notice shall be given before any such resolution can be considered

Mr. FAULKNER. It was under that view of the rules of the Senate, I will state, that the Chair sustained the objection and held that it would have to go over until the next day.

Now, the Senator must go a little further in his discussion of

Now, the Senator must go a little further in his discussion of this resolution than he does when he claims that if a Senator is present his name should be recorded and counted as part of those present to constitute a quorum. Where is it to stop? Suppose we are on a yea-and-nay vote upon a resolution, or amendment, or the passage of a bill. A Senator sits quietly in his seat here and refuses to answer. He votes neither yea nor nay. How are you to count him present under those circumstances? On which side of the question are you to put him, on the nay or the yea Yet those questions are involved in this resolution.

But I suggest that under the view which I take of this matter the discussion can not really proceed without unanimous con-sent, for the simple reason that it does not come properly before the Senate at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from West Virginia that this question comes before the Chair and the Senate upon the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon that the Journal is not correct. The Chair understands the Senator from Oregon to move to amend the Journal by the insertion of the names upon the paper he submitted. It occurs to the Chair that before the formal approval of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings this is the proper time to consider such a mo-

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this question, which is a very narrow one, if I can have the attention of my honorable friend from West Virginia [Mr. FAULK-NER], who was in the chair yesterday when the transaction occurred; and I shall endeavor to argue it good-naturedly, as the Senator from West Virginia did, because there is nothing to get heated about on this particular reint that I can see heated about on this particular point that I can see.

The Journal, when there is a yea-and-nay vote on which no quorum votes, is made up in this way:

The number of Senators voting not constituting a quorum.

It is very clear that that is correct. Nobody will doubt that is a correct narrative of the transaction. The only thing we it is a correct narrative of the transaction. can see about is whether the Journal contains a correct narrative of the transaction. Nothing else is in order now. We all agree to that way. But when the roll is called-I will read one passage from the Journal as an instance of several:

The Presiding Officer directed the roll to be called, when 43 Senators anwered to their names. The number of Senators present not constituting a quorum, On motion by Mr. Voorners, etc.

Now I understand the point of the Senator from Oregon, which is the only point which can be open at this time, as all agree, as the Chair and the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Tennessee have said, is that the Journal does not state that a quorum did not answer to their names on the roll call, but it simply says, "the number of Senators present not constituting a quorum," and whether that is a correct and true narrative of quorum," and whether that is a correct and true narrative of the transaction, when it is obvious to everybody that in addition to those who answered to their names on the roll call there were others present in their seats, enough to make up the quorum, who did not answer.

Looking at the strict meaning of language, everybody must Locking at the strict meaning of language, everybody must agree that the Senator from Oregon is right in his criticism, and that it should be stated of the result on the roll call as of the vote by yeas and nays, "the number of Senators answering to their names not constituting a quorum."

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question on the word "present."

Mr. HOAR. Notat this time, because I am coming very likely to what the Senator is going to say. On looking at Rule V we find:

If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the

That is the result of the calling of the roll. Then it goes on, in the third clause of Rule V.

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be as certained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms, etc.

Now, with great deference to my honorable friend from Oregon, and I thoroughly sympathize with him in his general opinion about the attitude of the Senate, and in his indignation, it seems to me that upon this particular narrow question the Secseems to me that upon this particular narrow question the Secretary of the Senate has kept the Journal accurately in form and substance; that is, that the rule clearly means, as it now stands, that certainly the Secretary can not disregard the presence of a quorum as ascertained by the roll call, and it is not ascertained by the Secretary or the President or any Senator looking around to see who are in their seats. This is what the Journal must record; and therefore if we are to get at this matter it handly are have a programment of the Lorentz states. should not be by an amendment of the Journal reciting what the rule does not call for, the fact that there were other Senators in their seats besides those who answered to their names. The Journal merely recites what is ascertained from the roll call; and the result which so many of us desire will have to be accomplished by a change in the rules of the Senate.

If I may be allowed one further observation. I can understand that men in a heated, angry, and earnest political strife receive propositions to amend the rules of their proceedings with something of heat generated by the particular question; but I believe the Senate and the country will in the end see that it is not possible for a body of eighty-eight men, eighty-eight political leaders, eighty-eight men sharing and to some extent creating the earnest political feeling which pervades all free people, to proceed under a system of rules which was designed or acted upon in the early days of the Republic, when the body was composed of but twenty-six men.

Now, our fathers conceived the Senate, and it was the greatest wow, our latters conceived the Senate, and it was the greatest political conception of human history. They conceived the Senate as a body where consideration, where deliberation, where the right of debate, where the right of the minority to be fully and fairly heard, and to persuade the majority, if it can, should be sacred and be preserved. I do not believe there is a member of this body who wants to change the rules or the practice of the customs so that that right shall be overthrown or in the least impaired. But they also conceived this body as a body to be governed, after debate, in voting by the opinion of its majority; and as a body whose constitutional assent was necessary to carr and as a body whose constitutional assent was necessary to carry into effect in legislation the will of the people constitutionally expressed. And the American people will have that thing done; perhaps not this afternoon or to-morrow, perhaps not this week or next week, but in the end, on all questions which affect the welfare of this people. By rules, through rules, or over rules, by the Senate, through the Senate, or over the Senate, the irresistible will of the majority of the American people will have its

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I desire to say in response to the Senstor from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that I am not trying to make the rules for the Senate. I am trying to have a construction put upon the rules of the Senate. So far as the threat that if I persist in my course I shall receive opposition from unexpected sources is concerned, I desire to say to the Senator that I never have endeavored to escape from opposition. I will stand alone if I stand right, and I am not to be scared by any such suggestion as that

My proposition this morning is that the order offered yester-day even if it had to go over until to-day, is an order for to-day. If it is not considered in connection with the approval of the minutes on the roll call which gave rise to it, of course the object will not be obtained, the result will amount to nothing. After the Journal has been approved, the Senate would hardly order an amendment of it in accordance with my proposed order. Consequently, if the order is in order at all, if it is a matter that can be brought to the attention of the Senate by the will of the Senate upon which a question can be invoked in such a manner, it must be now invoked; the resolution must be considered in connection with the approval of the Journal.

Now, one word more in regard to our rules. If it is correct that we can only get an amendment to the rules by common consent, if it can be prevented by endless talk, the same thing would be added to the contract of the contract o have prevented the adoption of any rules by the Senate when it first met and organized; and it would forever, in spite of the American people, prevent any amendment to our rules.

Mr. President, the Committee on Rules ought to present to the Senate a rule limiting debate to a reasonable time; and after such an amendment has been discussed to the satisfaction of the Presiding Officer, two or three days or more, it should be put to a vote, and if the majority of the Senate say that the amendment shall be adopted it should be afterwards enforced. That is the only way we can obtain an amendment to the rules. We shall never get it by common consent. I am satisfied if such a course is taken it would meet with the approval of the American people is taken it would meet with the approval of the American people and it would meet with the approval of a majority of the Senate. If we can not do that, if that is not to be done, we shall drift along with this question until the snow flies, and we shall not repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, or vote upon this question or upon any other important question in the Sen-

Mr. BUTLER. Why can we not vote on something else? Mr. BUTLER. Why can we not vote on something else? Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to contribute a few words to this discussion. Upon the general question of the power of the Presiding Officer in certain contingencies to count a quorum, of course there has been considerable dispute in the past. Upon that question my views are well known. When the question was first presented to the American people it was solemnly asserted by the opponents of the power that the only method known to the Constitution for determining the presence of a quorum was the calling of the years and nays and the responses thereto. It was the groundwork, the foundation stone of the quorum was the calling of the yeas and hays and the responses thereto. It was the groundwork, the foundation stone of the whole structure of the argument, that a quorum could not constitutionally be counted in any other way. It was said that while the Constitution did not expressly require that, it was fairly implied. For several years, while criticisms were made upon the conduct of the presiding officers who had here and in various parts of the country assumed the responsibility of determining the presence of a quorum in another manner, the question had not been determined by any court.

I assert that every lawyer knows, or ought to know around

I assert that every lawyer knows, or ought to know around this circle, that the theory that there is but one method or man-ner known in the Constitution for the determining of a quorum has been disposed of by the highest court of the land. I hold in my hand the decision, the unanimous decision, of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that question, and it is the de-termination of this first point upon which the whole controversy

But how shall the presence of a majority be determined?

As I said a few moments ago, that is the argument of the other side—that it either expressly or impliedly was required by the Constitution. The roll call and the responses thereto was the only method by which it could be determined.

The Constitution has prescribed no method of making this determination, and it is therefore within the competency of the House.

Referring to the case that arose in the House of Representa-to prescribe any method which shall be reasonably certain to ascertain the fact. It may prescribe answer to roll call as the only method of determination; or require the passage of members between tellers, and their count as the sole test; or the count of the Speaker or the Clerk, and an announcement from the desk of the names of those who are present. Any one of these methods, it must be conceded, is reasonably certain of ascertaining the fact, and as there is no constitutional method prescribed, and no constitutional inhibition of any of those, and no violation of fundamental rights in any, it follows that the House may adopt either or all, or it may provide for a combination of any two of the methods.

I assume, sir, that that decision of the highest court of the land is binding even on the Senate of the United States. Therefore, that question is disposed of completely. The Constitution can not be cited hereafter in this or any other tribunal in the land for the purpose of claiming that in some way or in form or land for the purpose of claiming that in some way or in form or shape the Constitution is violated in ascertaining a quorum other than by the responses to a mere roll call.

Now, what is the next question involved? The next question that was involved arose in my own State. I do not care to allude to that decision at this time. The question also arose in the House of Representatives, where the rules, like the Constitution, did not expressly declare in what precise manner the presence of a quorum should be ascertained. The House met in the absence of rules. It had to stand then, just as the Constitution is presented to us, without any specific manner and mode of determining a quorum. mining a quorum.

The rules of the previous Congress had not been adopted by the House. The ordinary rules of parliamentary law were to govern. The Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the exercise of his discretion, assumed to count the presence of members by observing and noting those he saw before him. Having requested them to vote, their bodily presence being known, sitting right in front of him, it requiring merely the ascertainment of a physical fact, he counted them. I believe, and always have believed, that that decision was a correct one. Why correct? Because the House had met in the absence of rules on the subject and must be governed by the ordinary rules prevailing in the gathering of assemblages, the ordinary parliamentary law. That ruling has been criticised, criticised in the main by men, I think, who have not studied the appetitude of the constitution.

That ruling has been criticised, criticised in the main by men, I think, who have not studied the question accurately.

I think the wrong, if there was any wrong done by what was there transacted in that Congress; was the transaction of business for so many months without having any rules at all; and in that respect I think the Congress was properly subject to the criticism of public sentiment. But I have never shared in the criticism which assumed to say that in the absence of the adoption of rules in the House, the Speaker had not a right to tell the truth; that the Speaker had not a right to exercise his own senses when a member sat right in front of him; and I believe that he had a right to hold that the Journal should say a member was present if that was the fact. Who is wronged? a member was present if that was the fact. What harm is there? Who is wronged?

What harm is there?
You are clinging here to some old tradition that has come down to you from the past. There is no sense in it. There is no reason in it; there never has been. Is anybody wronged? Is there any harm done? Whose rights are invaded? It is the duty of Senators and members to remain in their seats; it is their duty to take part in the transaction of public business, and if they refuse when requested by the Presiding Officer, then I say the officers of the body have a right to make the record show that the members are present. Now, so much for that.

The Senate, Mr. President, has certain rules. Is it to be contended that under those rules the only method of ascertaining the presence of a quorum is from the responses to the calling of the roll? Will some Senator point out that specific provision of the rules which so requires? You can not point it out. The rule refers to a vote; if it shall appear by that vote that there is no quorum, then the result is announced. That is one way, there is nothing at all in the rules upon the point as to how that there is nothing at all in the rules upon the point as to how that quorum shall be ascertained.

Upon this particular, precise point your rules are silent. You are here placed precisely in the same position on that question as though you had no rules at all. You are therefore governed upon this question by the ordinary rules of parliamentary law, because you have not undertaken to legislate or provide for this particular point. Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I will read him the third clause of Rule V, which does provide exactly the method by which there shall be ascertained the fact whether there is a quorum present:

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the ab-sent Senators.

In that rule the method by which it shall be done is expressly provided, which is a roll call. It goes no further to say that if upon the roll call being had there is not a quorum present, but other Senators are present in the Chamber, not voting, the Presiding Officer shall count them so as to make a quorum, which clause, it strikes me, would be necessary in the rule in order to bring it within the views of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. With all due respect to the distinguished parliamentarian from West Virginia, I think he begs the question. Of course the ordinary usual way of determining the presence of a quorum is by calling the roll; but that does not mean that the responses of Senators shall be the only method of determining whether they are here. A member asks to be excused when ing whether they are here. A member asks to be excused when his name is called. He is here. Is he also absent? Does not that fact of his actual presence go into the RECORD? It should go upon the Journal. The whole record is to determine whether there is the presence of a quorum.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know what importance he attaches to the phrase "shall call the roll and shall announce the result," if there is not implied necessarily in the calling of the roll and the announcement of the result that a quorum shall be aspertained by the responses to the roll call?

astertained by the responses to the roll call?

Mr. HILL. Upon the matter of the yeas and nays, of course a member must vote one way or the other, and in regard to that vote it is the responses on the roll call that must determine the result of the vote. That is one question; because no man can vote either for or against a proposition by remaining silent in his seat. So far as an affirmative vote or a negative vote is con-cerned the Senator is right; but upon the other question—

Mr. GRAY. That the Senator may not misunderstand me, before he goes on, I was reading from the rule that was made to ascertain a quorum when its absence had been suggested by any Senator. It is that "the Presiding Officer shall forthwiti direct the Secretary to call the roll, and shall announce the result."

Mr. HOAR. Read the first two lines of clause 3.

Mr. GRAY.

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not

Mr. HILL. But upon any roll call.
Mr. GRAY. "Upon such roll call."
Mr. HILL. A roll call for the purpose of ascertaining a quoim. There is no dispute between us as to what the rule is. It is simply a question as to the proper construction of the rule. I believe that the proper construction of the rule requires that the roll shall be called for the purpose of determining the responses; that is true in one respect, but if excuses are made, or if a member remains silent in his seat, it strikes me that the Presiding Officer has a clear right to count him. The responses determine the number of yeas and nays; the presence—the act-ual presence—determines the question of quorum. There are no words of exclusion in the rule, and it requires a strained and unnatural construction for the purpose of claiming that the re-sponses are the only method of ascertaining a Senator's pres-

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from New York if his contention is that under the rule of the Senate I have just read in regard to ascertaining a quorum, as it now stands, there is any other method of so ascertaining it than by the responses to the roll call? Does the Senator's contention go that far?

Mr. HILL. Yes.
Mr. GRAY. I should be glad to hear him on that point.
Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from New York permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HILL. Yes. Mr. VILAS. I wish to call attention to the third clause of

Rule VI, which reads:

3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the ab-sent Senators.

Now, suppose that order were made and the Sergeant-at-Arms should report that no member of the Senate is absent, that all are in their places, but not answering to their names, would there be a quorum present?

Mr. GRAY. No, sir.

Mr. HILL. Of course the Senator from Delaware and the other Senators who take the same view of the rules must admit that to carry out their reasoning to its legitimate conclusion involves an absurdity, because, as has been stated by the Sena-tor from Wisconsin, you can send for an absent Senator and compel his attendance, but how can you send for a Senator who is present and remains in his seat? Senators must concede that such a construction leads to absurdity and they must concede under that construction that the rules would be futile.

I think the proper construction to give these rules is to vitalize them, to make them consistent, to so construe them as to give us the right to transact business. They should have a reasonable construction, they should have a broad and liberal construction for the purpose of facilitating the doing of busi-

Therefore, I believe that the Presiding Officer of this body has a perfect right under these rules, upon a roll call, either upon his own suggestion or the suggestion of any Senator, to first ask a Senator in his seat to vote. If the Senator refuses to vote, then I believe the Presiding Officer has a right to direct the Secretary to enter upon the Journal the fact that the Senator was present and declined to vote. Is there any harm in this? What are you trying to do? Are you trying to conjure up something so that you can not do business? Are you trying to Are you trying to institute by a strained, unnatural, and unreal construction of your rules how not to do it? That seems to be the effort here. I think we should take another view of the question.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HILL. In a few moments. I want to go through with my argument.

That, I think, the President of the Senate has a right to do. Now, I think, the President of the Senate has a right to do.

Now, I shall branch off from that part of the discussion. I do not propose to cross any bridge before I get to it. I differ from my friend from Oregon [Mr. Dolph] upon this question. In the first place I doubt the wisdom of bringing this question up on a motion to correct the Journal.

It is true that last evening, when the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] was in the chair, the precise point was made that a Senator was present and not responding to his name, and the suggestion was made that his presence should be entered on the Journal or that he should be required to vote. The Senator from West Virginia in the chair ruled that the Presiding Officer had no power in the premises. That was the transaction which occurred here in our presence. The Secretary has substantially entered what occurred, and that is all. There was no control from the design of the Chair the secretary has substantially entered what occurred, and that is all. appeal from the decision of the Chair; there was no question made in regard to it. It is true as it stands there recorded. Therefore I am one of those who believe that this is not the proper method in which to determine this question. nal correctly states what occurred. The Chair decided that there was no quorum present. That was entered on the Journal, and the Secretary has simply entered in substance the decision of the Chair and the effect of the decision. Therefore I think the question is prematurely raised, and I do not think this is the proper way to bring about a decision of it.

The proper way to determine this question is when some Senator declines to vote to present the question to the regular Pre-the decision of this body. He may or may not feel bound by the decision of my distinguished friend from West Virginia when he was in the chair, who I am certainly willing to concede is one of the ablest parliamentarians in this body, but he may prefer upon this question to make a decision for himself.

Let us not complicate this question this morning with other and divers questions arising out of the correction of the Journal. I go further. I would not attempt to do indirectly what I would not do directly, and therefore I agree with the suggestion would not do directly, and therefore I agree with the suggestion that we ought not to attempt by any correction of the Journal to add to the rules or to make any new decision here. Let it come up squarely when the question is decided by the regular Presiding Officer of this body. If he decides that a member who is present shall be entered as present and regarded as present, an appeal can be taken from the decision of the Chair. If the Chair shall hereafter refuse to so decide, and shall follow in the footsteps of the decision of the Senator from West Virginia when the chair, then an appeal can be taken. That is the orderly and the chair, then an appeal can be taken. That is the orderly and proper method of disposing of this question.

I do not comprehend exactly what is the precise correction which the Senator from Oregon desires to have made. I do not agree with the ruling made last evening, but it stands unappealed from and unreversed. Therefore, I think that the best method, no matter what our views may be upon this subject as an abstract question, is to allow the Journal to be approved as it stands, and hereafter, at the proper time, let the question be presented, and then we can have a decision for all the future.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the question which is here presented, while perhaps it may not be capable of a decision which would be authentic as a ruling of the Senate, is one of very great importance, and one which has been very frequently discussed in this body as well as in the other House.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] raises the question as to whether or not the Journal of yesterday shall be approved, and he insists that in consequence of a ruling of the temporary occupant of the chair an incorrect statement has been made of the number of Senators who were present upon a roll call, which was instituted for the purpose of ascertaining-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will please suspend until order is restored.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Alabama resumes, may motion to amend the Journal pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] called up the resolution which was submitted by him yesterday. The Chair is ready to determine and pass upon the question raised by the Senator from Oregon, but debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. After the Senator from Alabama has concluded his remarks I shall raise the question of order. I thought there was a motion pending to amend the Journal. I understand now there is no such question before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that no motion to that effect has yet been made.

Mr. HOAR. Of course the Senator's resolution can only be called up when the order of resolutions shall be reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine that question.

Mr. HOAR. I shall raise that question when the Senator from Alabama gets through.

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator will not raise the question directly after the Senator from Alabama concludes, as some other Senators desire to be heard.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator will wait a while before he raises that question after having himself spoken.

Mr. HOAR. I thought there was a motion pending. Mr. TELLER. I think practically there is a motion pending. It is very gracious after the Senator himself has addressed the Senate to raise the question. It would be in accordance with many other things which have recently occurred here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the ques-

The Chair is ready to decide upon that question. No motion has been made by the Senator as yet to correct the Journal.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let the Journal be approved. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal has not been approved, but prior to the Chair asking whether there was objection to the approval of the Journal, the Senator from Oregon called up the question, which the Chair is ready to determine.

Mr. DOLPH. It ought to be understood that I make the mo-

Mr. DOLPH. It ought to be understood that I make the motion as an order. That is the order which I offered yesterday, and which must be considered before acting on the approval of and which must be considered below a transport the Journal and its correction. On that point, if the Chair decides that adversely, I shall submit a motion, but I do not wish to submit two propositions at a time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine that

Mr. DOLPH. Then there will be something before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At this stage nothing is in order but what pertains to the approval of the Journal. Therefore the resolution of the Senator from Oregon is not now in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Then I move that the name of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] be entered in connection with the roll call, which was had at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. yesterday on the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pet-TIGREW], showing the Senator from Nebraska to be present, not as responding, but being present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move that as an amendment to the Journal?

Mr. DOLPH. As an amendment to the Journal. I do not include the other Senator embraced in the order for the reason that we have positive proof that the Senator from Nebraska was present, for he responded immediately, as appears by the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not want the matter to be open to any question of fact.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Oregon to amend the That is in order. On that motion the Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama. Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to make a statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama

Mr. WASHBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I inquire whether the pending motion is debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable, in the opinion of the Chair. Mr. WASHBURN. I move to lay the motion on the table. Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can not do that while I am no the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WASHBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know that.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire, with the consent of the Senator from Alabama, to make a brief statement in connection with the statement of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not yield, Mr. President. I most respectively spectfully decline to yield.

clines to yield.

Mr. Mr. President, the matter has now got into shape where there seems to be a necessity for a decision upon what is the meaning of the rules of the Senate and Constitution of the United States affecting the procedure of this body. That question is whether or not it is the duty of the Presiding Officer, when a Senator is present at a roll call—whatever the nature of the roll call may be makes no difference at all-to have his name entered upon the Journal as being present, notwithstanding he may be silent, east no vote, or make no response whatever to that roll call.

That brings up the naked question whether or not it is in the competency of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, under its rules and under the Constitution of the United States, to make a Senator speak on this floor pro or con, or at least to make him speak or answer to a demand on a roll call. Whether he wishes to do so or whether he declines to do so it is the same question. This is the same question which was so ably discussed in the House of Representatives and for so long a period during the months of February and, I believe, of March, 1890. The question there was whether upon the call of the roll on the passage of a bill the members of the House who were present declined to vote, declined to answer, the Speaker of the House of Representatives had the constitutional right to record their names in order to make up a quorum, and then leave it to the majority not of the quorum, but of the majority which had voted, to determine how the bill should be disposed of, whether passed or not.

I am not at all surprised that the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has found it necessary on the floor of the Senate to champion the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Representatives on that occasion, because he was the unfortunate instrument when he presided, as I understand, in the senate of New York of the introduction of this heresy, not only into the Democratic party and its traditions, but also into the question of the Constitution and the constitutional rights of legislative bodies. I call it a heresy, Mr. President, because to my mind it is obviously that. It deprives, as I understand, the representatives of the people in the House of Representatives and of the States and the people in the Senate of the right by silent negative to obstruct and prevent action upon a matter which those Senators or those Members of the House may consider to be entirely beyond the power of Congress, revolutionary, and wicked. If that power does not reside in the representatives of the people in this Chamber and in the other House, then a majority ple in this Chamber and in the other House, then a majority fatally bent upon carrying their purposes into execution upon a topic which is purely political, and in respect of which the Supreme Court can pass no judgment, has it within its power to do that terrible thing, which is the crystallization of the power of tyranny in the hands of a majority, more dangerous than it is in the hands of any despot who ever ruled upon a throne.

If a majority in the legislative tribunals of a country assumes to itself the function and right of running over the Constitution of the country upon questions where the Supreme Court can have of the country upon questions where the Supreme Court can have no power to control their acts, is entirely irresponsible to the minority, because it is stronger physically and in numerical force than the minority, it has no restraint except such as can be extorted from it through revolution. Even judges of the Supreme Court, for instance, Mr. Justice Miller in the Topeka case, had his attention drawn during his de-liberations in that tribunal to the question of the power of the majority to work its own sweet will upon the minority, and he laid down in his opinion the great doctrine that the power of a majority in the United States was restrained, and only restrained, by the sanctions of the written Constitution. When they are broken down, when the organic structure of this Government is dislocated in such a way as that a minority has no protection against the power of the majority in political matters, then the whole scheme of this Government is lost and wasted by an ungrateful posterity, as it was passed originally by the framers of The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] the other day took pains in some remarks he made here to elaborate the point, upon great and high authority, that the Government of the United States, especially in respect of its written Constitution, was a Government intended to protect minorities. majority is always able to take care of itself, there is no diffi-culty about that. Give it free range, give it latitude, give it unbridled discretion to do what it may see proper to do, and it can not only always take care of itself, but it can in doing so destroy the minority

Mr. WASHBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if a majority of this body has been able to take care of itself in the last thirty days?

Mr. MORGAN. I will inform the Senator that he himself has sometimes been in a majority when he was not able to take care of himself.

Mr. WASHBURN. I have always been able to take care of myself in this body and everywhere else.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh. I have not seen it work out in a certain measure which the Senator has advocated here, and on which I have been with him.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think I did take care of myself on the The Senate passed it, notwithstanding the me sure referred to. Senator was not here

Mr. MORGAN. But the House of Representatives did not

Mr. WASHBURN. The bill first passed the House of Representative

Mr. MORGAN. The Senate passed it in some shape, in a shape satisfactory to the Senator, but not satisfactory to the other House; and yet, though there was a large majority in favor of s bill, he never got it through the House.

Mr. WASHBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon. It was satisfactory to the House, and on a motion to suspend the rules there was 50 majority.

Mr. MORGAN. Why did it not pass, then?

Mr. WASHBURN. Because it did not have a two-thirds vote, and because under the rules in that body, and which we lack here, a vote could not be had except on a motion to suspend the

Mr. MORGAN. Because the House of Representatives in conformation with the Constitution of the United States, in order to protect the minority against legislation which it considered to be vicious and dangerous, had required upon that particular occasion, in those particular circumstances, a vote of two-thirds to suspend the rule to get the bill before the House. That was all. That was another case of the protection of the minority against the voice of a majority as expressed in both Houses, and a powerful majority it was in each House.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the Senator will allow me, I think it was a case where a majority was not able to take care of itself, the same as is the case here now in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I said an unbridled majority, an unrestricted Mr. MORGAN. I said an unpridied majority, an unrestricted majority, an unrestrained majority can always take care of itself. The very purpose of having rules and constitutional provisions is to prevent that very thing.

I have not heard that the American people were outraged because that bill did not pass after all, although it was stopped in the House by a majority which was equal to only one-third of the House, and defeated and destroyed. That bill, Mr. President, had reference to a great public demand which was supposed to be, and believed to be, and argued to be, a demand on the part of the American people to redress grievances against vice perpendicular. trators of fraud, monopoly, and commercial tyranny. Now, there is a case where the minority in the Chamber, who so faithfully and so ably battled against that bill, have found themselves protected against the power of the majority in the House and in the Senate by the simple presence of a rule intended for the pro-

But to treat this subject more generally, as it was treated by the Senator from South Carolina, there is no doubt at all, at least there is no Democratic doubt—I do not know what doubts may rest in the minds of men who are always ready to seize arbitrary power for the purpose of carrying their will into execution—but for those men who support the Constitution of the United States, including the amendments to that instrument, as the Democracy traditionally do, the rights of minorities are a sacred thing, and they are esteemed to be things to protect which the Constitution was really ordained.

The quotations from the writings of Mr. Calhoun and of Mr. Webster—who was by no means a very strict constructionist of the Constitution of the United States—bore out the remarks and attitude of the Senator from South Carolina the other day, when he announced that favorite and incontrovertible dectrine, that in the United States, where you find a provision in restraint of legislative proceedings, the power of the Executive, or in restraint of any other power, civil or military, it is intended to restrain the power of the majority from running at will and pleasure roughshod over the minority.

Before I refer to some other matters in this connection, Mr. President, I desire to say in reply to the lectures which we have received here and to the lampoons which have been administered upon the Senate, and especially of what is termed the minority in the Senate, and by the newspapers in regard to this silver question, I think the Senate itself and Senators who question us so severely upon our attitude here upon this subject are treating us with extreme discourtesy and great wrong, if not

I profess to be, and think I am-I know I was until, perhaps, some events have changed, not my relations, but the relations of other men toward the Democratic party -a Democrat by con-I have found, Mr. President, beginning with the writings of Thomas Jefferson, coming along through the whole train of Democratic Presidents and leaders and exponents of Democratic creeds and doctrines, that the right of the people is to have gold and silver coined, they producing it by their labors out of the mines, that the Government of the United States having no power to produce it, no right to produce it even upon the public lands, and no State has the right perhaps to produce it. with all of its broad and unrestained powers in this respectthat these two metals were placed under the control of the labor of the United States by the Constitution in such a form as that the people had the liberty of producing it for the purpose of its monetization, and that the power and duty of the Congress of the United States was simply to coin it and to regulate its value. That has been always the Democratic theory, the Democratic rule. No Democrat heretofore until this year of grace, 1893, I believe, or within a very short period, has ever denied that that was one of the organic and fundamental features of the Democratic creed

So I had the supposition that when I was in favor, as I always have been—for I happened to make the first speech which I ever had the honor of delivering in the open Senate upon the subject—that when I was in favor of equal privileges for gold and sliver in coinage when it was produced by the people of the United In comage when it was produced by the people of the United States for that purpose, and that—the power of making money I will call it—was thus lodged in their hands, I had always supposed that that was a privilege to protect to which the Democratic party was committed out and out. When I came here, returning rom some other duties, somewhat late in the session and after the question had been up for some little time, I found a bill on our desks, and its passage demanded by what is called a majority of the Senate, and that bill had the double effect of refusing to the Government of the United States the power to buy silver and also the power of the United States to cause the coinage of any silver which might hereafter be produced from American mines.

That measure, Mr. President, struck me very much in the same way, and with equal force also, as if it had been a bill to same way, and with equal force also, as if it had been a bill to abolish the writ of habeas corpus, a bill to interfere with the private personal rights of individuals. In my judgment the bill is revolutionary, and is opposed to the whole experience and all the creed of the Democratic purty, and also the constitutional rights of the people of the United States. That is my view of it; and instead of our staying here to obstruct the course of property just legislation. I have regarded those who are called the and just legislation, I have regarded those who are called the minority in this body, who are opposed to the bill, as being here to stand by the Constitution of their country, as well as by its ancient practices and the Democratic creed. That is the way in ancient practices and the Democratic creed. That is the way in which it occurs to me. That is my honest and serious convic-I regard the Senators who appeal to the majority tion about it. to destroy silver mining, as being the unconscious enemies of the Constitution and being, whether they believe it or not, engaged in a deliberate purpose to overturn it.

Looking upon them in that light, although many of them are my brother Democrats, I feel that I have the right to stand by and protect that Constitution, and one of the means which has been resorted to—I have not resorted to it now or heretofore—of proresorted to—I have not resorted to it now or heretorore—of protecting that Constitution and of protecting the rights of the minority, as we are called, is for Senators to exercise their constitutional function of refusing to vote in this body.

Therefore we are not recalcitrants; we are not men who have no conscience; we are not men influenced by mere personal ambition or personal interest to defeat a measure which a mere majority of this body undertake to pass; nor do we believe that the people of the United States, the great voting power of this peo-ple, are with this so-called and self-constituted majority in this body, which, to make the most of it, is simply and only an alliance and coalition. We believe the people of the United States demand of us that we shall stand by their constitutional rights and not surrender them. I had just as soon, being a soldier enlisted in an army and put upon a picket post to guard the camp at midnight, throw down my musket and sneak into the bushes and hide myself from the enemy as on this post of duty here to refuse to use every power and all the vigilance that the Lord in-spires me with and clothes me with for the purpose of protecting this violent and fatal raid upon the constitutional rights of my constituency

There is their attitude as we understand it. Do you dony that we so understand it? Do you impeach us of dishonesty for this? Can we as Democrats be impeached of dishonesty for standing by the party creed which has lived since the foundation of the Constitution and before? Can I be divorced in my Democratic relationship and from the memories of the great men who laid the foundations of this great Democratic party, chiefly Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, to go rapidly over the horoscope of history, and Allen G. Thurman, and such men as those? Am I required as a Democrat to denounce them, to refuse to hear their counsel, or to weigh their arguments and their doctrines, to go back upon my whole record and theirs and the history of my party, in order that I may make terms with a coalition in this Sen te that is formed for a specific purpose and to aid a particu-lar design—to destroy silver money? No, sir. You ought not lar design—to destroy silver money? No, sir. You ought not to put an honest and a decent man in any such attitude as that.

For one, Mr. President, I am not ashamed of the position I take here upon this question. I have no occasion to be that I know I will not retreat from it, as if I were afraid to stand by the rights of my people. I have no occasion to do that. I will not bow to the leadership of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who has been recently, it seems, constituted one of the twin leaders of Democracy in the Senate of the United States. I have not trained with that honorable Senator heretofore in any political matter, and especially in respect of the rights of gold and silver; and there is not that man who lives who can get me into the harness and make me dress to the right when the Senator is my right guide in the line of battle. I do not propose to do anything of that kind. I would rather stand solitary and alone and accept all the objurgations and flouts and criminations and vituperations and insults that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] seems to be master of, to pour out upon the heads of men at least as good as he is, upon this floor. I would rather stand alone and breast the storm than to be put in the attitude, by a coalition of this kind, to be compelled to accept the leadership of the Senator from Ohio in my Democ-

Mr. President, I have been in this Senate Chamber now about seventeen years, and in that time many of the splendid men I knew when I first came here have passed away. Their example knew when I first came here have passed away. Their example is worth quite as much to me as the lectures on the proprieties of conduct which are so frequently presented to us for our consideration by these juveniles in the Senate from Massachusetts and from New York. [Laughter.]

A great deal has been said here recently about the dignity or the want of dignity in the Senate. Well, Mr. President, I never considered that there was very much dignity merely in starch. It is not the robes that a man clothes himself in, it is not the starch he has got in his toga, that gives him true Senatorial dignity on this itoor; it is honest, conscientious adhesion to proper constitutional methods of government for the sake of 67,-000,000 of people and forty-four States. Let his dignity and his propriety of conduct be measured by his devotion to the principles of this wonderful Republic; and above all, by his critical and careful devotion to a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States.

I do not wonder that a politician born and raised in New York, where arbitrary force is the moving agency in all political ma-chinery and movements, both Democratic and Republican, should at last come to believe that there was nothing else to be done in There is something else in it to me, Mr. President, and something else in it to my State. I can defend myself and my State against the arbitrary powers of any State or any set of men in the world when I feel that my rights and those of my people are planted upon the firm foundations of the Constitution of the United States.

A man may challenge my Democracy-and I do not care if he is as ancient as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Palmer] or as young as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], it makes no difference to me what may be his prestige or his power or his supposed authority—I shall stand for the rights of my peo-ple, and, in doing so, I venture the assertion that I will be quite as dignified as anybody.

I have sat here day by day and night by night, and I have seen men like Roscoe Conkling and Allan G. Thurman, Thomas F. Bayard, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is in front of me, sit silent when the rolls were being called. I remember one occasion here on the discussion of some bill—i can not quite remember what it was, but I think it was a military bill—when the Senator from New York, the predecessor of the Senator who now occupies one of the chairs from that State, moved a roll call in the Senate, and after he moved the roll call, refused to answer.

It was considered by the wise men of that day and generation that he had a perfect right to do it. He only exemplified in a peculiar and unexpected manner the dignity and the power of the authority of the commission under which he sat in this Chamber. It was to me an unexpected defense for the constitutional rights of the Senate and of the Senators, but it provoked no criticism; nobody rose to inform that great Senator that he was recalcitrant; nobody undertook to press a motion here to compel him to vote, and if, after that, he should refuse to vote, then he should be consured or expelled from this body, because that is the next step and the only one left.

Time and again-many, many times-have I seen the minority in this Sanate protect themselves in this same way. Here is rather a strong example of it. This was in 1850 on March 26:

Mr. Douglas, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the admission of the State of California into the Union.

That matter went on in the Senate of the United States until August 13, almost one continuous scene of roll calls, obstruction, measures of prevention, and delay and defiance, until, after a while, the voice of the American people was heard upon this

Mr. WALTHALL. When did the Senator say that was?
Mr. MORGAN. It began on the 25th of March, 1850. That was the admission of a State into the American Union. I supose that was a question quite as important to the people of the United States, except to the bankers—I will always except them—as the passage of this bill to corner the money market and to cause the people to be put in their power so that they can relax their grasp or squeeze them at their will and pleasure alternately, oscillating back and forth, and the people themselves compelled to follow the bankers in their gambling operations to see whether they shall starve or whether they shall thrive. That was as important a bill as this is, quite as important. Here was the action upon a fiscal bill, a great bank bill, one connected with a subject similar to that which we have under consideration here now.

By proclamation of President Tyler the Twenty-seventh Con-ress convened in extra session. That was an extra session also. So the cases are almost exactly parallel. They convened on the 31st of May, 1841, to legislate on the financial condition of the

That is the way the Senator from Oregon put it this morning, that we had been called here to legislate on the financial condi-tion of the country, omitting and forgetting for the time that the President also brought the tariff forward for consideration, that we have got both subjects to look after, and the only difference in the President's recommendation between the two is that he put one in front of the other, as he is obliged to do, in communicating his desires to us.

But is our legislative authority, when assembled here, confined to what the President of the United States chooses to put in his proclamation? It is a new idea that we are so far under the control of the executive power of the United States as that we must legislate in conformity with his message, and only upon the subjects which he submits to us. It is not very dignified, to say the least of it, on the part of the Senate of the United States if they accept such an admonition and such a rule of control even from the President of the United States.

The session to which I am referring was also an extra session, and this was a fiscal bill:

and this was a fiscal bill:

On June 21, 1841, Mr. Clay of Kentucky, from the committee to which it had been referred, reported a bill for the establishment of a fiscal bank of the United States.

On this measure Mr. Clay represented the bank party or interest and had the sole management of the bill.

Debate on the bill opened on June 24, 1841, and grew in warmth and earnestness from day to day. It was advocated by Mr. Clay of Kentucky, Tallmadge, Graham, Wright, and other able Senators.

It was opposed by Mr. Calboun, Benton, Buchanan, Linn, Allen, Woodbury, Rives, Clay of Alabama, King, and other able Senators. Few Senators from the South favored the measure.

So you see the parallel goes on.

On the 15th of July, 1841, Mr. Clay of Kentucky saw fit to use the fol-lowing expression in the course of his remarks: "He would resort to the Constitution and act on the rights insured in it to the majority, by passing a measure that would insure the control of the business of the Senate to the majority."

That was his proposition. That is the proposition put forth in scarcely less decisive terms by the Senator from New York [Mr. Hill] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], and by many other Senators who have spoken on this floor.

This was intended to mean that he would enact a rule, a cloture in its nature, and institute a gag as it were, thus suppressing opposition by the mi__rity.

Mr. King of Alabama retorted in reply in these words: "He could tell the Senator that, peaceable a man as he was, whenever it was attempted to violate this sanctuary, he, for one, would resist that attempt even unto death."

There was that splendid man, William R. King, afterwards elected Vice-President of the United States, beloved by the people because he stood by the Constitution of his country, who replied to the towering genius of Kentucky on that occasion, when he said that he would resort to cloture as a constitutional right to stop debate—you will do it, sir, in violation of the rights of this Senate, and if at all, over my dead body.

I would not dare, Mr. President, in this degenerate age to rive in this Senate and say to the majority in this body, if you pass, as you claim you have a right to pass, and as the Senator from New York says you have the right directly to grasp this power in spite of the rules and pass this bill by your arbitrary power of the majority, I would not dare to say what Mr. King said, "you would do it over my dead body." I will say nothing about that.

While I have the privileges of a Senator upon this floor I shall respond to that noble sentiment of that great and good man by saying that he was right when he stood thus for the constitutional rights of his State and of his people; he was right, whatever extremity it might have driven him to or might drive any other man, and the country would rise and call him blessed, beother man, and the country would the honor to stand by the consti-tutional rights of his constituency.

That debate went on for a very long time. The bill was passed on the 28th day of July, 1841, after almost continuous discussion and investigation from the time it was reported by the Senator from Kentucky.

I have here before me the Journal of the Senate in regard to another matter, which brings forward in a sense, and very apnother matter, which brings forward in a sense, and very appositely, too, the consideration of the precise attitude which I hold here to-day as a Democrat. A gentleman had been elected by a Democratic Legislature in Virginia to this body, Mr. Mahone; he had some peculiar ideas about local finance, which were called Readjuster notions. Elected by a Democratic Legislature as a Democrat, having been always by profession a Democrat, he came here, and the Senate was so narrowly divided that his vote would carry it the one way or the other. He was admitted to a seat in this body without question, I believe, and then, in reward to him for services past, or to provide security for the future in respect of what should be his political course, the Republicans—all of them—came forward in support of his candidate for Sergennt-at-Arms of this body, Mr. Riddleberger, who afterward obtained a seat in this body; he, too, I believe, being elected as a Democrat—but about that I am not quite so certain. He may not have been.

Then a controversy arose about his election as Sergeant-at-Arms. That was at what we call an executive session of the Senate, convened by order of the President, the other House not being in session. That contest began in this body on the 24th of March, 1881, and it ended on May 6, 1881. During that time the resolution was discussed on March 24, 25, 26, 23, 29, 30, 31, April 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 26, 27, 28, May 2, 3, 4, and 6, in all twenty-eight days, during which there were 152 roll calls. The minority in the Senate on that occasion obstructed the majority by every possible expedient which was known to paramaterized.

majority by every possible expedient which was known to par-liamentary usage, and yet, so far as I know, at least in the tradi-tions of the Democratic party, none of us have been considered traitors because we prevented Mr. Mahone from executing his alleged treason against the Democratic party which elected him, by going over into the camp of the enemy and strengthening their forces and swinging the whole power of the party in this Chamber into their hands.

Then these gentlemen, who are so fond of prating about the dignity of the Senate, found themselves engaged here for months together in an effort to force a coalition—a coalition which was together in an effort to force a coalition—a coalition which was to break up the Democratic party and its power, a coalition which, in that respect and on their part, is identical with the one now before this body, in my humble judgment. Whatever its purpose may be, its result will be to break up the Democratic party, unless the minority have some consideration at their hands, and unless the majority are willing, before they strike the feet blow to coalette the possible of the feet blow. the fatal blow, to go back to the people and take their advice upon the subject.

The parallel between the two cases in my mind-and I speak of the opinion of no one but myself-is a striking one. here during all that period of time, and I never failed to answer to a roll call, as this record will show. I was sustaining the power of the majority, thus obtained, by carrying Mahone into their camp to break up the Democratic organization of the Senate and turn Mr. Bayard out of the Presidency pro tempore; I stood by them in obedience to what I considered to be then my constitutional privilege and duty. I did not break any quorum, but many a time I saw the venerable gentlemen, some of whom are before me now, retire, not on that occasion, but on other occasions—setting the example to us—retire to the cloakrooms, and some of them sat in their chairs mute and would not answer to their names on a roll call, thereby exercising this clear con-stitutional privilege in the case of the election of Riddleberger, which was a mere question of party triumph. In the case of the Army bill, it was a question of the triumph of might over right and justice; in the case of California, it was a question of the admission of a new sovereign State into this Union; in the case admission of a new sovereign State into this Union; in the case of the Fiscal Bank, it was a question of sustaining the ground taken by President Jackson as against the reincorporation of the United States Bank in any form whatever.

Those were the questions which were then attracting the attention of the country, and on every one of them, and many others which I shall not refer to here, this same proceeding that we are now engaged in was resorted to for the purpose of breaking down any sudden action on the part of the majority and of cetting an any sudden action on the part of the majority and of getting an opportunity to go back to the people and ask their verdict upon the questions involved in the contest.

Why co you wish to push this measure through in such hot haste? Is it because the country is to-day suffe ing from the pangs and agonies indicted by this anaconda coiled around their throats—the actional banks? I know they have been compelled to relax largely, and will be compelled to relax entirely, their held out of consideration for their own money-making. They can not hold to their present attitude, for the expense is getting too heavy for them, and they can not bear it much longer.

Can you not wait? Do you want to crowd us to the wall in order that the banks can cry out post hoc, proper hoc, you have repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and that prosperity which was due to the country and was approaching with rapid steps has occurred, and we claim the whole glory of I claim the right to go to the people on this bill, on this whole measure.

We thought we had gone to them and discussed it and we thought that the people had decided it in the last Presidential election; we had not any doubt about it, for the platform so instructed us. Now that there has arisen a discussion, or a quibble about what the platform means, let us go back to the people. The people are not going to suffer any greater calamity than they have already suffered, and they are outliving that which is now upon them.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a statement of the proper doctrine, as I conceive, upon this question. The Constitution was adopted—

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, before he leaves that branch of the subject I wish to protest against an imputation to which the distinguished Senator from Alabama has some how or other gained his own consent and causes to be put upon those who differ with him upon this question. He has said here again to-day that those who think this question ought to be speedily voted upon are obeying the beliest of a cordon of national banks; that they have no other motive; and that there is no other condition or given extence which affects those Senators. no other condition or circumstance which affects those Senators except the interests of national banks and the plutocratic ring variously described and designated.

I wish to protest against such an imputation. I wish to appeal to what I believe to be the sense of justice that resides in the breast of my learned friend to consider again whether he can fairly and justly to his colleagues on this floor upon either side of the Chamber (and certainly I may appeal to him as to those on this side) continue to make that imputation. I for one denounce it. I for one say that I am urgent for action upon the pending bill, not because national banks want it, but because pending bill, het because hational banks want it, but because the business of the country, because the bone and sinew, the honest toilers for daily bread in large sections of the country are to-day turning in every direction, without response, for employment, that they may support themselves and their families, and it is because I believe that this condition, which would be relieved by the passage of the bill, has brought that state of things about that I am anxious and urgent for action, and for no other

Mr. MORGAN. In imputing to the Senator from Delaware the very best intentions in the world in his advocacy of the bill (as everybody who knows him will concede to him good intentions apon whatever he does on this floor), I will take the liberty of saying that he is utterly mistaken, in my judgment. he is mistaken so far as my constituents are concerned in regard to their desiring the bill to be carried through the Senate of the United States to the destruction of silver as a money metal. He is utterly mistaken.

But granting, if you please, the largest and broadest interpretation that can be placed upon words in the nature of accusation and crimination in respect to those who form this coalition, for it is no Democratic movement—the majority of the Democrats in the Senate are the other way—

Mr. GRAY. It is a patriotic movement.

Mr. MORGAN. Ah, patriotic! Now grant, if you please, the utmost weight and severity to every word that he imputes to meand I did not say half that he said when he called me in question for the words that I have been using here this morning—it is but a feeble retort against those rhe torical and scurrilous outrages which have found utterance on this floor, and from this floor through the newspapers of the United States, where men are branded as traitors to their country because they stand upon the old Democratic doctrine.

How often have I seen my own name arraigned in the newspapers as an upstart traitor, a trifler with public affairs, a man who ought to be dismissed out of this body, and the like of that; and my brother Senators here who have acted in concert with me have been assailed in their personal characters and in every other way with the utmost degree of violence and vituperation because we stand for what we believe to be the constitutional rights of our own constituents. The Senators from the silver tors, as if they were a lot of skulking savages.

Mr. GRAY. Characterized on this floor?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not think we have the authority for it here. They have been characterized as men whose pockets were to be lined by the defeat of the pending bill, who were protecting their personal interests, who were the owners of silvers. ver mines and were exploiting their opposition to the bill for the protection of their personal and individual interests. Yet I know, from information derived from Alabamians who have visited that part of the country and who have written to me in respect to the distress of the people already incurred, that while the pending bill may possibly, though I do not believe for a moment that it does or can give any relief to those people spoken of by the Senator from Delaware, it has already wrought destruction and ruin to many an honest man, to many a man who supposed that he had laid firmly the foundation of his own prosperity and that of his family for all time to come.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me,
I should be very glad to call his attention and the attention of the Senator from Delaware to some objurgations or recriminations or abusive epithets which have been applied to Senators on our side of the question by Senators upon this floor. The Senator from Delaware can not fail to have remembered that senator from Denaware can not fail to have remembered that quite a number of times (I will not undertake to say how often, but quite a number of times) our conduct has been denounced as revolutionary, as having for its purpose the object of stopping the wheels of Government; and one Senator, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], was denounced the other night by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE], if I am not mistaken, as having been guilty of conduct which was dragging the Senate of the United States into the dust. I heard no protest in any direction at that time against those charges; and now when I think a very mild retort is made by the Senator from Alabama he is taken to account by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me just a moment to reply to the Senator from South Carolina? I am not seeking a grievance by any means; I am not courting personal controversy on matters of etiquette and courtesy with any Senator; but I have observed, I can not fail to have observed, that throughout this debate Senators have been exceedingly sensitive on the side of the opposition to the proposed repeal to any sort of characterization of the attitude that they assume; but I have heard no imputation at least upon their motives or their conduct which be compared to that which was not only made awhile ago by the Senator from Alabama, which he has explained somewhat, but by other Senators over and over again upon the motives and the conduct of those who are in favor of repeal. They have been charged with having an unworthy and unholy alliance with men They have been who sought to use the legislative powers of this country for their own aggrandizement only, regardless of the suffering, the blood, and the tears of the masses of the people. That has been said over and over again.

Now, I do not propose to submit without a protest at least to imputations of that kind. I can differ with the Senator from South Carolina and maintain my respect for his motives and his This question should not produce more than any other question, a state of things here that would trample in the dust all the much-talked-of courtesy of this body. We can debate this question without violating the ordinary rules that should govern debates between persons occupying the high positions we

As to the criticism made by way of offset to what was said by the Senator from Louisiana the other evening in regard to the Senator from Idaho, I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that the Senator from Louisiana was south Carolina to the fact that the Senator from Louisiana was commenting upon a palpable, flagrant, open contempt and defiance of the rules of this body.

Mr. MORGAN. What was that?

Mr. GRAY. In refusing to vote when the rules of this body expressly say that he is required to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. He had a perfect right to do it.

Mr. GRAY. Very well; he has a perfect right, then, to defy and violate a rule of this body; and if to call attention to that and to speak of it as it describes to be spoken of as a defiance of and to speak of it as it deserves to be spoken of, as a defiance of the rules of this body, as an open violation of the rules of order, which must be preserved if we are to preserve anything of that dignity talked about by the Senator from Alabama a little while ago, is to be characterized as personal or insulting, then I fail entirely to be able to discriminate between proper provocation and no provocation.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not impute personal desires of aggrandizement to any Senator here. The Senator can not find any ground of hostility in anything I have said on that point. I say this, and I repeat it, too, that this coalition in the Senate was created in defense of the national banks and for the purpose of destroying silver money

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say for myself that that is untrue Mr. MORGAN. Well, the Senator can, if he wants to make a personal application. Mr. GRAY. No. 1 d Mr. GRAY. No, I do not. The Senator is making a personal application, and has charged something which I repel.

Mr. MORGAN. I have made no personal charge.

Mr. GRAY. I say that it is untrue if the Senator applies to

Mr. MORGAN. I have not applied it to you, and if you apply it to yourself I can not help it.

Now, Mr. President, here is a bill that professes to comply with the Democratic platform. It professes to do it. The Democratic platform contained a denunciation which was very much more severe than it was decorous or polite, or I might even say decent, in regard to a law which had been passed by the Congress of the United States. They called it a cowardly makeshift. They applied the remark to the whole bill, to the whole scheme, not to a section of it.

When I was returning to the United States, recently, I was met on the steamer by one of those interviewers and asked how I stood upon the repeal of the Sherman act. I said "I am for the repeal of the Sherman act," and I am to-day. I would vote for it to day; and I intend before this debate closes to move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to put the repeal of the entire Sherman act to a vote in the Senate. Then I will see where you stand. I intend to do that. I shall do that on my own responsibility, without consulting anybody else in the world. That is my view of the situation, and I intend to do it. the world. That is my view of the situation, and I intend to do it.
Mr. CULLOM. You will vote for it?
Mr. MORGAN. Of course I will vote for it. But now in place that which is the distinct command of the Democratic platform, what have we here? A bill that repeals the purchasing clause of the Sherman act and leaves no authority on the part of the Government of the United States to buy silver. That is all stricken out and gone. Then you deny the right of the people stricken out and gone. Then you deny the right of the people to take their silver bullion and carry it to the mints and haveit coined. So you shut off both avenues to the use of silver as money, leaving a possible resort to the amount of silver already in the Treasury for coinage and stopping the business just there.

Now, in regard to the silver mines in the United States that are still not worked, in regard to those vast deposits of silver bullion that rest in the mountains of the West, I will ask what will Congress do with that under this bill, except to say by this legislation that it does not now and never shall constitute a money metal? You must go to the tinker shops and to the jewelry shops, to the silversmiths, and to the foreign markets with your stuff; you can not sell it to the United States Government, neither can you have it coined. If a more fatal blow than that could be struck at what I conceive to be the constitutional right of the people of the United States to mine silver and have it coined, I do not know how you will shape it. That is the

What is the next step? You leave the rest of the Sherman act in force. The act requires that every dollar of Treasury notes that has been issued in the purchase of silver bullion when redeemed shall be reissued, so that the amount in circulation shall equal at all times, no more and no less, the amount of the cost of the silver bullion and the silver dollars coined from it purchased under the Sherman law. White pretending that you are trying to protect the Treasury of the United States you are running a tap upon it, a gold sluice; you open a spigot by emptying out the gold into the hands of gold speculators just as fast as you can collect it by taxation from the people or purchase it with bonds.

One hundred and fifty million dollars of these Treasury notes is presented to-day under the Sherman act and redeserts. the bill, not in the form you find it now, and it is again put in circulation through agencies of the Government. It is money and must be reissued says the law, and you propose to leave it in that situation. A month from now that same $150,000,000 comes back and you redeem it in gold again, and the same process is gone through with.

Now, that is a hypocritical pretense and nothing else. It can not be anything else. I am not using a word that is too strong to denounce it, and I do not care who takes it up, I will vindicate it. It is a hypocritical pretense.

Here you are pretending to repeal and get rid of this "cow-ardly makeshift" and leaving that feature in the law which requires that the notes issued in pursuance of it, $150,000,000, as fast as they are redeemed shall constitute on the very next day after their redemption, and get into the hands of the people, a new demand upon the Treasury for more gold.

How are you going to get that gold? Here are the national banks which have forced the Government of the United States to borrow gold and tax the prople for it. What for? Just to keep up this circuit of redemption and reissue, and redemption and reissue, so that instead of saving this people from the trouble that you say you are trying to save them from, you fasten it upon them in a way that they can not possibly avoid it, and you compel taxation to borrow gold in order to pay this same money time and again.

One note issued under the Sherman law of a thousand dollars One note issued under the Sherman law of a thousand dollars or any other denomination may be redeemed fifty times in gold by the Government of the United States, and still it comes back in the shape that you will have the law now for redemption again. Will you try to persuade a man of ordinary common sense that that is a compliance with the Democratic platform of getting rid of the "cowardly makeshift?"

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair).

Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.
Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Alabama of course understands the character of these notes. They are nothing more nor less than greenbacks; they have precisely the same character as the greenback

Mr. MORGAN. I beg leave to differ with the Senator there, to begin with. Mr. ALLISON. In their essential characteristics they are greenbacks. I ask the Senator if the experience of our country as respects greenbacks does not indicate that they do not go round and round again, and that they are not in fact redeemed more than once in ten or fifteen fifteen years?

Mr. MORGAN. If they are greenbacks and have the leading and distinctive characteristics of greenbacks, and if greenbacks have not gone round and round, what is there to alarm the Senator from Iowa about the redemption in gold of this money that go round and round too?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary for the Senator from Alabama to ask me what alarms me; I am not alarmed.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not believe the Senator is.
Mr. ALLISON. And I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that these notes have the essential characteristics of the United States notes. They are a legal tender; they are redeemed on presentation; they are required to be reissued as the greenbacks are. Therefore, as respects the thing which he is now debating, namely, the redemption of these notes day in and day out, the experience with the greenbacks since 1879 is that they have not been redeemed at all, practically.

Mr. MORGAN. The only possible excuse that has been urged by any man, including the President of the United States, for this called session and for this harsh legislation proposed, has been the fact that gold could be drawn out of the Treasury upon the Sherman certificates and carried abroad. The Senator now

Mr. ALLISON. It can, but it has not been done.
Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.
Mr. MORGAN. Neither has it been done with the other notes, but now you provide that ex necessitate this currency shall be kept out. How? There is no law requiring the greenbacks to be reissued beyond $346,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. But they must be reissued to that extent, so that every greenback now out comes into the Treasury, whether by redemption or in the ordinary course of the customs revenues, etc., and it must be reissued just as the Treasury notes must be

Mr. MORGAN. To show the fallacy of the foundation of the argument of the Senator when he asserts the parallel between the greenback currency and this Sherman law currency, you can issue if you keep the law in operation, a thousand millions of the Sherman bills, every one of which, according not to the law but according to the construction placed upon it by Secretaries of the Treasury, is redeemable in gold and in nothing else. You can not issue more than $346,000,000 of greenbacks, and the difference between the two in the cases stated would be the difference between $346.000,000 and $1,000,000,000. They are not identical in any possible respect so far as that is concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. That may possibly have been in the President's mind when he suggested that some time we should stop the purchase of bullion and stop the issue of these notes. It may have been in his mind; I do not know.

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose it is our duty to stop the purchase: for what do we stop the purchase and the issue of the notes? It is for the purpose of preventing gold being taken out of the Treasury of the United States; for their whole argument has hinged upon the one proposition that the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman law withdrew the gold from the Treasury. Here you propose to resnact the Sherman law and say, in respect to the Treasury notes that are outstanding, when you have redeemed them you shall issue them again, and you shall keep up deemed them you shall issue them again, and you shall keep up a continual drain upon the Treasury of its gold. Now, for what purpose? In order that the men who started this scheme and have been upholding it by panies and all manner of false predictions heard in this country, shall have a chance to compel the Government of the United States to issue more bonds in order that they may have a broader range for their circulating notes. Silver having been driven out of competition with them, they have the field to themselves.

Now, after all, a more selfish, a more devilish combination than that was never conjured in the human mind. Nothing worse than that can be said of a financial operation. What may I say of the enlightened men who know all about this and advocate the scheme? I shall not characterize them. I will leave that to posterity. It is not necessary for me to do it. They will be marked in history as men "who know the right and yet the wrong pursue," for ages and ages to come, that they had betrayed the most sacred trust of the generation amongst whom trayed the most sacred trust of the generation amongst whom

When I came here and found this the situation I expected to find the Democratic party in place for the repeal of the Sherman law. Instead of that I found that after they had started out to do that, when they found. I suppose—that is my belief—that that was not sufficiently friendly in its nature to the national banks, they came down to a lower stoop. What was that? We will not repeal the entire act, but we will repeal the purchasing clause of it, and leave all of the balance of this hideous monster that they had so declaimed and declared against standing there, not only unrebuked, but actually reinstated by their power of amendment and reënactment.

That is the situation. I was startled and astonished at it. I asked some of my friends here, Did the Democrats of the House and the Senate propose to have a joint caucus in order to determine whether there was any misunderstanding about the natermine whether there was any misunderstanding about the national platform, what its true Democratic construction was? None at all. Has the Senate Democratic party held a caucus, a caucus with a view of trying to ascertain and state something of that kind? Nothing whatever. Have efforts of that sort been made? Yes, they have been made and repulsed; they have refused to go into council with us. Well, after they have done that and I find them in council with the leaders on the other side of this Chamber, I can not call that combination anything else than a coalition for resnactment.

Is it a Democratic movement? No, sir; I repudiate it as a Democratic movement. It has no authority here as a Democratic movement. I am willing now about the construction of our platform—I will go into caucus with Democrats to ascertain what the meaning of it is; and if I can not agree with that I will come out and state, like a man ought to state, "I disagree with you, gentlemen, upon points of vital consequence. I will no longer wear your uniform. I am an honest man. I will come out and tell you that I have no longer a place in your midst."

What would a Democrat in 1837 and 1838 have done if a caucus what would a Democrat in 1831 and 1838 have done it a caucus had been assembled and that caucus had resolved that the United States Bank should be rechartered? He would have walked out of the assembly and said, "I have no part with you in this at all. You are Democrats, I am not; I shall take my action independently of you.'

So I come here and find that after all these overtures, all these attempts at reconciliation, nothing has been accomplished except a coalition with the other side of the Chamber. I thought that perhaps there must still be an opportunity of getting us together, and I proposed a joint committee of the two Houses to consider the financial question.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Alabama for a moment, if it will not be disagreeable to him. He has referred several times to a coalition with this side of the Chamber. I should like to know what he refers to when he speaks of a coalition, and what the coalition is. Mr. MORGAN. I mean an agreement between the Democrats and the Republicans who favor the pending bill that it shall not be amended in any particular whatever. That is the first not be amended in any particular whatever.

proposition. Is that right?

Mr. WASHBURN. Go on.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that right?

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to state that there is no coalition of any description.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. WASHBURN. No agreement or understanding?
N. No agreement or understanding of any

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire also that the Senator and his friends on the other side of the Chamber should understand that the Republicans, every man of them, stand now where they have always stood in the last thirty years, in favor of honest and sound

Mr. MORGAN. Well, if they are standing— Mr. WASHBURN. Republican Senators are here on this floor with constituencies behind them, at least nine out of ten demanding that the purchasing clause of the Sherman act shall be repealed that the country may be relieved from the terrible condition into which it has been plunged. I desire to say to the Senator that when he states there is any coalition of any kind he does a very grave injustice to every Senator on this side of the Chamber favoring repeal. We come here—
Mr. MORGAN. Will my friend stop? I am not going to yield the floor for him to abuse me.

Mr. WASHBURN. I have not done so; I beg pardon.

Mr. WASHBURN. I want to assert that myself and the Republican Senators

Mr. MORGAN. You are intruding yourself into the controversy when I had not the Senator in my mind. I never thought about him as the leader of the Republican party.

Mr. WASHBURN. No. sir, I do not profess to be; but I profess to be a Republican, and I am not to be stampeded or insulted for the position I have taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama

declines to vield.

Mr. MORGAN. I am here on this floor responsible for every word I say in this Chamber-inside or outside, either. Now, do you understand that?

Mr. WASHBURN. Yes, sir, I understand that perfectly.
Mr. MORGAN. I am perfectly responsible for it. The Senator from Minnesota says that the Republican party have been entirely consistent in their conduct in the last thirty years. That is ten years longer than is necessary for my purpose. Eighteen hundred and seventy-three will do for me. In that In that year they did demonetize silver, and they did come to the single gold standard and single gold coinage; and there was the death and destruction of silver money.

Now, that they have held to it consistently and persistently I do not doubt. I have never said anything to the contrary. That bimetallists, so called, on the Democratic side profess to find better company among men who are responsible for the act of 1873 and its maintenance from that time to the present than they can find among the Democrats on this side to me somewhat strongly savors of coalition. It rather convinces me to that effect.

Do not lose sight of the weight of evidence because some gentleman may get up and say they had not had any hand in the contract. I do not pretend that they made a verbal agreement. No; it is not necessary for men to have verbal agreements to do a thing in concert; but you understand just as well as I do that you will not vote for any amendment to the pending bill. You will vote against every amendment to it, and you will not vote for the repeal of the Sherman act. I am going to put that to the test, and that will be the crucial test.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I have heard enough of his statement. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama de-

Mr. MORGAN. The immediate question here, upon which we are supposed to act as revolutionists, comes up on the basis of a constitutional provision which I suppose without any offense to anybody in this Chamber can be read from the book:

And the year and mays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

I do not know any way to create an exception to that constitu-tional provision in favor of or against any particular sort of a question. It includes all questions, whether they arise on roll calls or the passage of bills or resolutions, motions to lay on the table, to indefinitely postpone, or adjourn, or any other question. If one-fifth of the Senate, or of the House—the Senate in this case—shall demand a vote by yeas and nays they are entitled to have the records show what that vote was, and that record discloses the fact whether a majority of the entire body, or a majority called a quorum to do business is present. That is a constitutional provision. We could not any of us get away from constitutional provision. that if we chose to do it.

Then we come to the rule of the Senate prescribed upon that then we come to the rule of the senate prescribed upon that basis which has been read here, the fifth rule. I need not read it again, but it prescribes a roll of a being the means of ascertaining whether a quorum is present. Now, the absence of a quorum may be ascertained by the suggestion of the Chair. It may be ascertained by his looking over the Chamber and finding 3 gentlemen here, if you please, when there ought to be 85 or 88. He may thereupon announce that no quorum is present. or 88. He may thereupon announce that no quorum is present. Butthatis not a final announcement. The announcementamounts to nothing in law until the roll is called. Non constat, they may be in the cloakroom at a convenient distance to be called, and they may come in and answer to their names. A roll call is what is required to determine the presence of a quorum, and nothing That is the rule of the Senate.

When the roll call is made and a Senator imagines or believes or knows that some Senators are present in this Chamber who have not answered the roll call, then the question arises can the Presiding Officer of the Senate determine it upon any other evidence than that disclosed by the roll call? If he does, when evidence than that disclosed by the roll call? If he does, when a roll call is demanded, he violates the Constitution of the United States: that is all of it. He is bound to follow it. Suppose it is upon the passage of a bill, and upon the call of the roll there are 10 yeas and 15 nays in the Senate, and yet the Senate is full. The bill does not pass because no quorum has responded. Would be then go on and count the entire body to ascertain if a quorom was present, and because 10 voted nay and 15 voted yea declare that the bill is passed? Mr. President, a more absurd usurpation than that could not be expected of a room more designation. tion than that could not be conceived of or one more dangerous

But I do not intend now to go into a full examination of this latter. On another occasion, when Mr. CRISP was a member of the other House, and when he was making a speech in the House on a certain resolution, Rule XV proposed in the House as the law of the House, he did me the honor to read there a letter I had addressed to him in my anxiety about this question. I had been ill for some weeks; I could not get out of my house to participate with my brethren who were defending the Constitu-tion of the United States so gallantly in the House and to assist them by my presence or in anyway that I should in the great fight they were making against tyranny in high places.

Mr. CRISP was speaking on the subject and asked the Clerk to read clause 3 of the proposed Rule XV as already amended. The Clerk read as follows:

On the demand of any member, or at the suggestion of the Speaker, the names of members sufficient to make a quorum in the Hall of the House who do not vote shall be noted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker, with the names of the members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do busi-

Now, there was a rule proposed, not a legislative determination on the spur of the moment, such as Mr. Clay proposed, which called forth from that splendid gentleman, my predecessor in the Senate of the United States, the declaration, "the Senator may do that, but he will have to do it over my dead body." This was the rule proposed, the question of the guidance of members of the House in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in dealing with legislative subjects.

Mr. Crisp, the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, then said:

I had the honor the other day, when I submitted some remarks on this question, to quote distinguished Republicans, including the presiding officer of the House, to the effect that this rule which you propose now to adopt, is unconstitutional. In support of that view of the Constitution. I propose now to read a letter which I have received from a very distinguished constitutional lawyer.

He bestowed upon me a compliment that I never felt I was entitled to; but this is the letter and this was my attitude then, as it is my attitude now. I desire that the gentlemen who have fulminated here an entirely new doctrine, both undemocratic and unconstitutional, will do me the honor to read this letter after I put it in print and see if they have any fault to find with it: FEBRUARY 4, 1890.

DEAR MR. CRISP: I am confined to my house with "grippe," and have followed with deep interest and feeling the audacious invasion by the Republicans of the constitutional rights of the House and its membership in the various rulings of the Speaker.

I can not add anything new to the exact definition of the rights of the "House" or its members, but I may be able to present some views that will illustrate and bring within the easy reach of the people this subject, that has a deep and somewhat obscure foundation in our constitutional system, but is elementary, fundamental, and of the gravest importance. I will, therefore, beg to trouble you with some of my ideas.

I do not quite agree that there is any general parliamentary law that is obligatory on Congress. There certainly is not such a traditional code to bind the Senate in respect of its extraordinary powers in confirming appointments, making treaties, or trying impeachments.

These powers must be exercised under rules, which the Senate or the statutes must provide. It was impossible to govern the Senate undertraditional parliamentary law, and so the Constitution provided for a government by rules.

This provision is the same for both Houses and for reasons equally imperative in both. In the counting of the electorial votes for President and Vice-President, and in impeachments, and as to privileged questions, arising under the Constitution, and many others, the parliamentary law of England is not applicable. Rules must be established. But the great controlling reason why English parliamentary law was never adopted, and never could be, in our National Government, was the fact that the king is a part of the Parliament, and once but elected members constitute the Houses of Congress. The king's perogative is in force in England's Parliament, to hold the kingdom together and under check, and therefore the Parliament is absolute in its powers.

I commend that to my friends for their mature consideration.

The Speaker of our House is not sovereign, and can have no prerogative. He is not charged with preserving the Union or Constitution, but is placed in a state of obedience to the House as its organ.

I refer to these matters as incidental to the curious assumptions of the Speaker, which he endeavors to support by the precedents of the British Parliament. The parliamentary law of the United States is suit generis, and consists of constitutional ordinances that all must obey, and the rules of legislative bodies thereunder, and the practice of such bodies under rules, either in actual existence or formerly existing in the legislative tribunals.

The parliamentary law in the United States is the American parliamentary law, and it is neither English, French, nor German in origin or substance. A foundation was laid in the Constitution of the United States that supplanted the British parliamentary law, as industria, and made the rules of the Houses the law of their government.

The rules or laws under which a House is organized are not necessarily those for its subsequent government.

Less than a quorum may conduct certain specific duties, but the House can not consist of less than a quorum.

A House is never present when a quorum is absent, so it is the quorum that constitutes the House.

To be a quorum "to do business" there must be present not less than a majority of those who were elected and qualified as members.

On these requisites everybody agrees; without these requisites there can be no quorum to do business, nor is there a House to do business.

"To do business" includes all business except as is except by the Constitution.

stitution.

It is the right of the people, and the right and privilege of every member of Congress, whether he is with the majority or the minority, on the "business" that is being done, that that business shall be done by the simultaneous and concurrent action of a "quorum to do business."

This fundamental law of Congressional legislation was ordained as a prohibition upon each House against doing business in the absence of a quorum. It is more in the nature of a protection to the majority of the House than to the minority.

It is more in the nature of a protection to the majority of the House than to the minority.

This constitutional law has no reference to majorities or minorities on the topic or subject included in the business that is being done, and still less reference to party majorities or minorities. It relates only to the majority of the House that makes a quorum to do business, and requires the action of that majority to do business.

Whenever it appears affirmatively and conclusively that this majority did not do the business, the Constitution vitiates what was done.

When this fact appears affirmatively on the record of the proceedings which the Constitution requires each House to keep, nothing can validate the action.

which the Constitution requires each House to keep, nothing can validate the action.

When less than a quorum has voted on the business, and this appears of record, it must be that the business has not been done so as to bind the House or anybody else.

Does the presence in the House of members make them actors in doing all the business that is before the House at the time for its consideration? If they were thus made actors in doing the business, after they have refused to act by not voting, there must be a power superior to theirs which somebody can employ to compel them to act, or else to act for them. This power, if it exists, is not in the nature of physical compulsion. That is not physically possible.

It must be a substituted mental or will power, under which one member is authorized to make himself the substitute for the other and to supplant his will as to giving his vote. He is not even assuming to act as the proxy of the nonvoting member to declare his will, but he usurps the function of voting that the silent member could thus increase his powers one or fifty times by such usurpation, for any purpose, whether to make a quorum or to do business.

iffly times by such usurpation, for any purpose, whether to make a quorum or to do business.

Before inquiring whether the Speaker is ex officio invested with this power, another consideration of vast importance is to be disposed of, namely: The necessity and value to constitutional liberty, and to the security of person and conscience on the part of the member, in the silent negative he may choose to give to "the business" that the House is considering. He call leave the Chamber and exert his silent negative. Is he bound to absent himself to do this, or may he remain to see that the record is truly made; that is, to state his silent negative?

A question touching religion is presented in a bill that the Speaker has declared to be in order by laying it before the House for consideration. A member believes, as every one must, that it is not within the jurisdiction of Congress.

It is a bill to endow and establish the church that the member loves and believes to be the only true church. He prefers, as he has the right, to defeat that bill by his silent negative that will prevent a quorum from being engaged in that business.

that bill by his silent negative that will prevent a quorum from being engaged in that business.

It compelled to vote, he could not vote "no" on that bill. But he is not compelled to vote, and his silence defeats the bill and saves the Constitution from being violated.

Two-thirds of a quorum can expel a member. If a motion is pending to expel A, and his action or presence is needed to enable the House to do that business, his decent silence or his retiring from the House would save him from what he connectives to be the greatest wrong. It is impossible to conceive that he would be required to vote or else commit political suicide by remaining in the House.

If a bill to abolish a State government is brought before the House, a member refusing to vote to make a quorum to do this violence may prefer to give no opinion, by voting, that the State in question is wanting in population and will never be sufficiently populated to support a State government, and that it is a corrupt or imbecile pocket borough and a mere appendage of an adjoining State, whose inhabitants represent it in the Senate and the House, his silent negative defeats the doing of that business by breaking a quorum.

an adjoining State, whose impaintants represent it in the Senate and the House, his silent negative defeats the doing of that business by breaking a quorum.

If the subject is under consideration in the Senate, the two Senators from that State, inhabitants really of a different State, may choose, instead of voting, so as to make a quorum, to assert their silent negative, and thus save the State and themselves without voting on a matter in which they are directly and greatly concerned on their personal account.

Many other illustrations might be given to prove the value of the silent negative, but they are not needed, and the matter is self-evident.

In every government that is strictly representative, as ours is, with a voting constituency, it is a right, higher and more conservative than any other, that every sort of business done by the representatives shall only be done by the actual participation of a quorum to do business.

Any other rule would give to an indifferent, negligent, or corrupt member the power to betray his constituency by standing mute and being counted asspeaking.

A bribe given a member of Congress to express an opinion outside the House might not be an indictable crime, but if he took the bribe as a reward for his silent negative by which a quorum is broken, he is criminal, because his silent negative by which a quorum is broken, he is criminal, because his silence expresses his vote against a quorum. If it has that effect it is most potent and criminal. Could the Speaker relieve him of the crime by counting him as a unit in a quorum? Such would be the necessary effect.

The legislative duty of the member is performed by the Speaker, and by his mere presence he has voted to make a quorum, when by his silence he earned his bribe in voting against a quorum. But far above such considerations is the right of every citizen to repose for his security in every form upon the constitutional requirement that only a quorum can do business, and that such a quorum is a majority of the House engaged con until a roll call is completed and he has counted all of the silent members as being present? If he may so imprison them in order to make or keep in his sight a quorum until a bill is passed, he can just as rightfully chain them to the floor in order to secure their attendance.

In Greas Britain the actual presence in the Commons and in the House of Lor is of the queen and the lords temporal and spiritual may enable this assembled sovereignty to give the Speaker the power to force a quorum to stay in the House; but this is very far from being true in our country, where the Constitution is express and written law and the savereign people have made that book the limit of the powers of the Speaker and of each House.

where the Constitution is express and written law and the sovereign people have made that book the limit of the powers of the Speaker and of each House.

Whatever code of parliamentary law may exist in this country, and whatever may be its acceptance as authority, there is no law of the Constitution or of Congress that gives power to the Speaker to compet a member. present or absent, to do or participate in the business before the House.

The Vice-President presides over the Senate in virtue of the Constitution but he is not a Senator and can not be counted in a quorum. The Speaker of the House must be a member.

This difference in their respective qualifications made necessary the provisions that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker" and that "ach House may determine the rules of their proceeding."

This is all that is said in the Constitution about the Speaker of the House. The House, beyond dispute, governs itself and all of its officers. When any power of government is exerted by the Speaker he must find his warrant for it in the rules of the House, and not in rull "s made by other bodies or the opinions of publicists. A "House" is a quorum to do business, and any ruling of the Speaker that is not expressly or by implied assent authorized by the "House" has no legal foundation on which to rest.

Unless there is the consent of the "House" that the Speaker shall add the silent members to the list of voting members, he can have no more authority for doing that than he would have to refuse to have the names recorded of those who did vote. Even the consent of the House could not confer that power on the Speaker, so as to deprive a member of his right to put a silent megative on the business of the House by refusing to vote so as to make a quorum.

The power of the House is to compet the altendance of members, after the regarder on the dustness of the house by refusing to vote so as to make a quorum.

The power of the House is to compel the attendance of members, after the absence of a quorum has been disclosed. Even the House can not compel the arrested member to vote. It can fine him, or, possibly, expel him, for refusing to attend the House when in session, but, when his attendance is coerced, he can not be made to vote. He can just as freely decline to vote, and so break a quorum, when he is arrested and brought in, and so employ the power of his silent negative, as if he had never been absent from the House, or as if he were absent and had not been arrested and brought in.

House, or as if he were absent and had not been arrested and brought in.

It is not the will of a political or other majority that the constitutional designation of "a quorum to do business" is intended to protect. It is the free, untrammeted will of each member, when he chooses not to vote, that is intended to be protected by fixing, in the Constitution, the definition of a quorum. This free, untrammeted will is of the very essence of the liberty of the member and of the people he represents. No higher privilege, and none more sacred, than this can be stated. Without it the House, or the Speaker, as its organ, can enact laws by the power of men who refuse to vote.

Speaker, as its organ, can enact laws by the power of men who refuse to vote.

Indeed, the Speaker, ruling that a bill is in order, can pass a bill by any number of votes less than a quorum, though a full House should stand by and refuse to vote.

He counts voters as votes, and in doing this he assumes the power to ascribe to the silent member an affirmative vote for the bill. Say that 165 is a quorum, and that 160 votes are recorded on the call of the yeas and nays, 100 silent members being present. Neither "party" has a quorum. One hundred votes are recorded for the bill and 60 against it. When the Speaker "notes" the presence of the 100 silent members and declares a quorum present and the bill passed, he must place all the noted votes among the "ayes," otherwise the bill would be lost. So that the process of "noting" is nothing else than the House, or the Speaker as its organ, voting the silent 100 in favor of the passage of the bill.

If the rule is not good and indisputable in such a case as I have supposed, it can not be good when 8i votes are given for the passage of the bill and 70 are given against the bill, would defeat it. Nothing could be more unjust or usurpatory or more dangerous than to give the Speaker the power to say that the 5" noted" votes should speak so as to make a quorum, but should be silent as to the passage of the bill.

A bill is passed when the votes are recorded, not sooner and not later. Nothing but a majority of votes can pass a bill, and that majority must comprise a House, for, without a quorum there is no House competent to day business except to "adjourn from day to day," and "a smaller number (than a quorum) may be authorized to competent to each House may provide."

It requires rules that "each House may determine" to enable a smaller vide."

It requires rules that "each House may prolifered as each House may prolifered than a quorum to do even these things, and there is no reference to any power, virtute officio, in the Speaker "to determine" these rules.

I have used the italics, as I have intended all else I have said, to suggest to you merely my ideas, which I dare say you will find already well considered in your own thoughts and researches.

The subject is so important, that I know you will excuse my solicitude.

Very truly, yours.

Mr. President, I think that the proposition there stated dis-poses of the question in respect of the right of the Presiding Officer of the Senate to require the Secretary to put upon the record the name of any Senator who may be present in this Chamber and who may decline, by his silence, to answer to a roll call. To assume power of that kind on the part of the Presiding Offlwould be in this case to violate the rules of the Senate.

Then, to alter the rules of the Senate for the purpose of coerc ing Senators who have stood here for years and years in this body and have witnessed its most illustrious members pursuing the same course, of a silent negative-for the protection of the rights of their constituents, wou'd be, above all things, harsh and calamitous. For Democrats in this Chamber to do that thing. to attempt to compel me to vote, if I choose not to vote, upon this question, would be a tyranny so incomprehensible that if I could believe it I should almost doubt my existence, and would be certain that if that were Democracy I had never had the slightest symptoms of that heresy to have cloture put upon us in order to pass this bill? I defy them to do it. The people of the United States would rise, upon such a proceeding as that, with far more vigor than they rose against those roll-call proceedings in the House of Representatives which cleaned out the Republican party until there was scarcely a flavor of it left in the country.

I defy you to pass a cloture rule here. You can not alarm me scarcely a navor of it left in the country.

I defy you to pass a cloture rule here. You can not alarm me into subordination for your scheme for anything of that kind. I am not going to vote at the will of any man, or any set of men that ever lived, in favor of the surrender of the constitutional rights of the people I represent, or in favor of yielding up any of my rights as a member of this body, in order that the howling, rampant demanders of concessions to national banks shall have all that they want.

I will not go further in this business. It is a painful business to me. I take no pride and no pleasure in it. I have but extreme mortification.

I tried, as I remarked awhile ago to the Senate, to get through a resolution for the purpose of organizing a joint committee of the two Houses, to consist of fourteen members, before which all of these different features, and amendments, and interests, and objects would be represented and heard. I offered the resolubollets would be represented and fine the control of the calendar, and debate went on until it finally got on the Calendar. But I was as impotent to lift it from the Calendar as a child would be impotent to lift a thousand-pound weight. That resolu-tion went into the committee room with 26 other bills which can not be considered at all-bills of every form and fashion, in regard to finance; bills that would open up to consideration of this committee every question that can possibly be suggested, so far as I know, about this business. Yet they are as silent as We get no response. the tomb.

What is demanded of us is this: To stay in this Chamber and to vote. It is said, if you do not vote we will count your presence, we will put cloture on you, and we will pass this bill by the power of the majority, although it may break up the rights of your constituencies and your right as a member of this body to stand here and demand that you shall be a witness of the sac-

The proposition is that you must escape from the Chamber; that you must go out and hide yourselves where the Sergeant-at-Arms can not find you before you shall be excused from voting. If you are in the Chamber, where you have a right to be, and where you ought to be in order to bear testimony whether the transactions with reference to which this bill is pressed are lawful and constitutional or otherwise; if you dare to come inside of this Chamber, you will be voted as contributing to the power, not of the minority, but to the power of the majority; you will be taken from the attitude that you have held here upon your conscience, and by the arbitrary judgment of the Presiding Officer of the Senate you are to be compelled to contribute to the power necessary to pass this bill.

With differences like these, between Democrats, in respect of this old and time honored policy that we have so long observed, and that the people have so long felt that they were depending upon for their protection and security, to be threatened continually with cloture, to be spoken of in the most disparaging and disreputable manner, to have our private and personal characters attacked—as we know too well has been done in the case of the honorable Senator from Nevada, where the newspapers accused him of personal theft, in order to cast odium upon this body—we stand here to defend ourselves against these acrimonious and bitter accusations, some of which have been made here. others having been made by men on the outside of this Capitol who have brought tremendous pressure to bear against us. We stand here accused, but not intimidated, and occupy this position here to-day which has been often honored by the same conduct, by the greatest and purest Americans who have lived.

We do not deserve this denunciation. But I have my bosom and say, "Welcome all these stabs; hurl at me all the missiles that your inventive genius and your arbitrary tyranny may place within your hands for my destruction. If I must die, I will die like an honorable man, at my post of duty, lifting my voice in the defense of the Constitution of my country.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I suppose I may be pardoned if I say that I fall to see what is the provocation for the eloquent he-I have tried to listen to this deroics of my friend from Alabama. bate from its commencement, with respect to those who have differed from me, in order to gain what light I could from the discussion, and hear what propositions were asserted and maintained that were material to a proper understanding and determination of it; and I have, I must confess, failed to hear much of argument, or evidence, or proof of any of the material propositions that affect the judgment, as to how one should vote upon this question, from those who oppose the repeal.

I may be pardoned for the criticism made in kindness and with entire respect to the Senator from Alabama and other Senators who have discussed the question on the other side when I say that vituperation is not argument; that the imputation of unworthy personal motives does not carry forward the argument on the side of those who indulge in it; and that there has been a certain seeking, by those who oppose the repeal, of pretext for the indulgence of that mode of speech which, it seems to me, is unwarranted by anything that has been said in argument on this floor by those who are in favor of repeal.

I do not assent to the proposition that the intemperate discussion carried on in the newspapers (if it be intemperate), the personal allusions or attacks made in the newspapers, are any justification to a Senator, in his desire to vindicate himself, in doing so by abuse of those on this floor who differ with him. I do not think it is necessary for the Senator from Alabama, or any other Senator, to take that mode of showing his resentment against outside attacks, that he should turn upon those on this floor who differ with him and wreak upon them the punishment that, justly or otherwise, he may desire to visit upon those who are guilty of such conduct.

But I did not rise for this purpose. I certainly did not rise for the purpose of reading a lecture to anybody. I will not assume that rôle. But I thought, without any desire to prolong the discussion upon this motion, I ought, before it closed, to say a word in regard to what I consider the erroneous position taken by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] in regard to the potency of our rules.

Mr. President, the procedure of this body, the conduct of public business in this body, has been and must be carried on in accordance with the rules it has itself prescribed. There is no other mode known to me, nor, I believe, to an Englishspeaking people, whereby there can be an orderly conduct of government, except according to rule. Liberty itself is only valuable when regulated by law. It is impossible that we should achieve any results in this body, that are worthy the name and fame of the American people, unless we show a capacity to conform ourselves to the rules which we ourselves have prescribed.

Those rules have been in existence a long while; and I understood that the Senator from New York had found, with the able exegesis for which he is famous, in the body or the rules themselves somewhere a power to declare a quorum when no such quorum was manifest by a roll call on the passage of a bill or resolution. I am not speaking now of a call of the Senate.

I ask the Senator from New York now if I did not understand him that his contention is that upon a roll call of the Senate on the passage of a bill or resolution it was competent for the Presiding Officer, in the absence of the disclosure of a quorum upon the roll call itself, in some way or in some fashion, which I did not quite understand he indicated, to take notice of the presence of those who were bodily present, but who had refrained from participation in that particular business?

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me? Mr. GRAY. Certainly; if I have misstated the Senator's position.

Mr. HILL. I think the Senator has substantially stated it cor-

Mr. Hill. I think the senator has substantially stated it correctly. May I repeat in a moment what my position is?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. According to the ordinary principles of parliamentary proceedings I claim that it is within the power of the Presiding Officer, in the absence of express rules to the contrary, Presiding Officer, in the absence of express rules to the contrary, to determine the presence of a quorum, always subject to rule, or to be guided by the rights of Senators. That is my first proposition. My second proposition is that there is no rule of the Senate which expressly, or even impliedly, excludes that method. Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from New York if he makes any distinction between the power and duty of the Vice-President in the chair as compared with that of a member of the body temporarily called to the chair.

Mr. HILL. None whatever.
Mr. GRAY. I am glad that I have not misstated the full contention of the Senator from New York. He has made it very clear. Upon that I am compelled to take issue with him.

We are here now, according to the statement of the Senator from New York, not considering a proposition to amend the rules, not debating a new rule proposed, but to give construction to the rules that already obtain for the governance of this body.

As I said at the outset, we are obliged by the necessity of the case, by the necessity of orderly procedure, by that necessity which compels all men of our blood and lineage, to proceed in an orderly fashion to the obtaining of parliamentary results.

But the Senator from New York is mistaken, I respectfully submit to him, when he says that in regard to the ascertainment of a quorum to participate in legislation or in the matter of passing a bill or resolution, there is no rule which covers the case, either explicitly or impliedly, none that excludes the power which he asserts is in the Presiding Officer, subject to the dom-inant control of the Senate; nothing which excludes the power of the Presiding Officer to declare a quorum even where one has not been disclosed by the roll call.

Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Rule XII, which has been in existence, or some similar rule, for probably a hundred years, provides explicitly for this very matter of determining a quorum and regulating the method of voting and ascertaining the sense and will of the Senate upon any given proposition. It is headed, "Rule XII, Voting, etc." provides that-

When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may, for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote.

Section 2 of the same rule provides that-

When a Senator declines to vote on a call of his name-

That is the very exigency which the Senator says is not covered This rule of the Senate undertakes to provide how by a rule. This rule of the Schate undertakes to provide now that shall be dealt with; and it does so in this language—he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor; and having assigned them, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Schate: "Shall the Schator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?"

It would seem to me to be rather in vain for the Senator from

It would seem to me to be rather in vain for the Senator from New York, after reading that explicit rule, to say that there is no rule of the Senate providing for just the contingency we are dealing with, to wit, the declining to vote by a Senator. That rule does provide for that contingency.

I may say, parenthetically, that I am not discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of this particular mode of dealing with this contingency, but the rule in this paragraph does undertake to deal with that question. The fact that there has been for all these years an explicit rule providing for what shall be done in that contingency, excludes the contention of the Senator in that contingency, excludes the contention of the Senator from New York that there can be any other competent mode by which it can be dealt with, because the rule says that when he declines to vote he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor. Is there anything there that authorizes, permits, or justified the provident to be conjugated to the conjugate of the conjugate to the conjugate of the conjugate fies the President to recognize him as part of a voting quorum? Nothing whatever. It is absolutely forbidden by the language of this rule and by the maxim, if a maxim were needed, expression It is absolutely forbidden by the language writts, exclusio allerius.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Have I said that his presence should be ascertained and re-

Have I said that his presence should be ascertained and recorded as part of a voting quorum?

Mr. GRAY. I thought that was the Senator's contention. If I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is entirely wrong.

Mr. GRAY. When I say part of a voting quorum, I mean that those who decline to vote shall be counted as part of those present necessary to make a quorum to do business.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Delaware will not contend that the rule which he has just read applies to a call of the Senate to ascertain a quorum and therefore is not applicable to the question before the Senate?

Mr. GRAY. Not at all. I am coming to that in a moment. I may be pardoned for taking a somewhat wide range on the question, inasmuch as the Senator from New York has brought up the subject.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to make one suggestion in order to show the absurdity of the present rules. Suppose on a call of the Senate there are actually present the 85 members now constituting the Senate, and less than a quorum vote. What would the Senator do? Must we sit here absolutely helpless, or should we instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request Senators who are already in their seats to come into the Senate?

Mr. GRAY. The so-called reductio ad absurdum of the Senator from Oregon has occurred quite frequently to those who have discussed this matter. There is no help, is my opinion, for it but the self-respect, the sense of duty, and the conscience of individual Senators.

dividual Senators.

I have been, for my present purposes, contenting myself with discussing the interpretation to be put upon the rules as they now exist, and which the Senator from New York has contended officer and the Senate to pursue. When I was interrupted I was calling attention to the fact that this rule has pointed out one mode, and only one mode, of dealing with this question, and a mode which necessarily excludes any other.

When a Senator declines to vote on call of his name, he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor; and, having assigned them, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?"

The Senate may excuse him from voting, and yet his bodily presence is here just as much, whether he be excused or not excused. The question—shall be decided without debate; and these proceedings shall be had after the roll call and before the result is announced.

"These proceedings." Stopping there makes the inference a plausible one that something else may be done by the Senate; that this rule was not intended to land itself in any such impotent conclusion as that after a Senator had been called upon to assign his reasons for not yoting, and either declined to assign those reasons or not assigned sufficient reasons, in the judgment of the Senate, to excuse him, nothing further shall be done. But the rule is explicit, that at that point the proceeding must cease until the result is announced. It says that—

These proceedings shall be had after the roll call and before the result is announced.

So it has covered all the ground by an affirmative rule upon which the Senator from New York could possibly claim to place his contention of power in the Senate to deal with the question up to that point; but it did not land us in so powerless and absurd a situation as that, for it says:

And any further proceedings in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Whatever may be said of the power of the Senate in regard to its action after the result, whatever inference may be drawn (and I am inclined to draw from that an inference of power of pretty wide extent), certainly up to the declaration of the result by the Presiding Officer the ground is entirely covered by this So no place is left for the contention of the Senator from New York upon which to ground a claim of power in the Presiding Officer of the Senate to count the vote or deal in any manner with a recalcitrant Senator than that prescribed by the rule on the subject.

As I said before, we are not discussing the wisdom of this rule. It might have been different. It may be different in some future amendment. But, sir, I have not yet learned the lesson of parliamentary law that we are to discard a plain, straightforward, easily understood rule because we doubt its wisdom. That is anarchy, that is lawlessness, that is an utter destruction of all that orderly procedure which is absolutely necessary to the preservation of free institutions.

Mr. GEORGE. If the result announced—that is, the final result-should be that no quorum had voted so that the motion had failed, can that be correct?

Mr. GRAY. I think not except by roll call, because the rule covers the point absolutely. It is not left us to grope in the dark as to what orderly procedure should be, for another rule says absolutely that when, upon a roll call for a vote, the absence of a quorum is disclosed, the President shall thereupon immediately order the roll of the Senate to be called. That is Rule V. So that the ground is completely covered up to that point. That is the situation prescribed by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, if there be no roll call—

Mr. GRAY. That is, a roll call for a quorum, a mere roll

Mr. GEORGE. That would be an entirely different proceeding.

Mr. GRAY. I will come to that in a moment.
Now, Mr. President, we have arrived at another stage in this which is provided for by the rules, and that is when the procedure which is provided for by the rules, and that is when the absence of a quorum is disclosed by the roll call on a vote. Rule V provides that when that is apparent from the result announced by the Chair—I am stating it from recollection—he shall at once order a roll call so as to ascertain whether there is a quorum actually present. Now we have a different state of things. We are not voting now; we are not saying "yea" or "nay;" we are saying "present," when we are here in our bodily presence. We are here to respond to a physical fact, as to whether we are present or no, visibly and palpably, in the Chamber. It is made the duty of every Senator. It becomes the duty of every Senator—there is no use of mincing words about it—by every consideration you can give the subject, to answer that roll call if he is within the hearing of the Secretary or the President.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to make a brief suggestion right there?

Mr. GRAY. I should rather not at this moment; I will yield in a few minutes. I seem to be the subject of this discussion to Mr. ALLEN.

some extent.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to state a fact very briefly, so that the Senate will understand it. Mr. GRAY. I beg the of my discussion. I beg the Senator's pardon; he is not the subject

Mr. ALLEN. I seem to be the subject of this resolution, how-

Mr. GRAY. I am not speaking to the re-olution, so that I am not obeying the rule of the Senate exactly, but I have conformed myself to the rather wide range that custom has given to discussion in the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I simply wanted to suggest that the Senator from South Dakots [Mr. KYLE] and myself were not present in the Chamber at the time our names were called. The proposed order, in so far as it states that the senator from South Dakota and myself were in the Chamber at the time our names were called, is entirely incorrect. The Senator from South Dakota and I came into the Chamber after both our names had been passed on the roll. So that when the Senator from Oregon recites that we were present in the Chamber at the time, it is an incorrect recital of the fact.

Mr. GRAY. That settles it, so far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, as a matter of fact; but I am dealing now with the question of the propriety of the existing

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I do not propose to raise here an issue of fact in regard to that matter. ator from Nebraska responded when the order was offered. I offered the resolution in accordance with the facts as I thought them to exist; but I am not going to raise any issue of fact here. If the Senator makes the statement that he was not in the Chamber at the time his name was called on that particular roll call, I shall accept his statement. Mr. ALLEN. Inasmuch a

Inasmuch as the Senator from South Dakota is now in his seat, I should like to have him state what the facts

Mr. KYLE. I corroborate the statement of the Senator from

Mr. GRAY. Now, we come to a different condition; we come to a roll call in order to ascertain the presence of Senators in the Chamber; not to ascertain the state of mind or the opinion of any given Senator; not to say whether he has made up his mind to vote "yea" or "nay;" but to ascertain the mere physical fact whether he be present or not. That is covered by the rule to a certain extent, that-

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not resent, a majority of the Senators present may direct—

We are coming now to a roll call to ascertain whether there be a quorum present or not. If the result be announced that there be no quorum, then it shall be competent for "a majority of the Senators present" to "direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators.'

That is a very different question from the one that I have been discussing briefly, and inadequately I admit, with the Senator from New York as to what the rules prescribed and what is competent for the Senate or the Presiding Officer of the Senate to do when the mere absence of a quorum is ascertained upon a roll

I wish, and I rose principally for that purpose, to draw a distinction between the two. Not only am I of the opinion, as I have stated, that the rules, as they exist, cover completely the matter of the absence of a quorum on a vote, so far as the competency of the Senate is concerned to count a quorum, but I believe that it is incompetent and improper for any other disposi-tion to be made by rule of that contingency. Fdo not believe that it is within the competence of this body by a rule to pre-scribe that a Senator, who sits silent during a roll call or vote, scribe that a Senator, who sits sheat during a roll call or vote, shall be counted as one to participate in the business then before the Senate. That is very different indeed from the other question of merely ascertaining the presence in the Chamber of a quorum, which does not call upon any Senator to more than ascent to the evident, palpable, physical fact that he is present. But I say that when the situation authorizes a majority of the Senate to do business, it only authorizes business to be done by a majority who participate. a majority who participate.

is impossible, in conformity to any rule which governs parliamentary bodies such as ours, to override that essential and foundation principle of our Government, that no law can be imposed upon this great people which does not receive the assent of a majority of both Houses of Congress. Any other view of this question, any other contention, such as was made a few years ago in another place than this, it seems to me, is revolutionary and entirely discards that great notion that the representatives of this people, or a majority of themselves, are omnipotent within the limits of the Constitution, but that nothing less than a majority can speak with the voice of authority to the great American people.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand the Senator to say, and I agree with him in that statement, that a roll call is for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of Senators; but do I understand the Senator to say that when the transfer or the senators. Senator to say that under our rules the response of a Senator is the only evidence which the Senate can have of his presence?

Mr. GRAY. No; I have not said that.

Mr. DOLPH. I understood the Senator to say that.
Mr. GRAY. No, as I said, the rule covered it in part.
Mr. DOLPH. I understood the Senator to say that that was the only evidence, under our rules, that the Senate can have.

Mr. GRAY. No, I did not even say that. It was not necessary that I should. for the purpose of what I was saying, exhaust the provisions of the rules upon that subject, because I believe it is quite competent, under the rule which provides for the compelling of the attendance of an absent Senator, that if a Senator should be brought into the Chamber by the Sergeant-at-Arms and before the bar of the Senate, his bodily presence may be

Mr. DOLPH. Suppose that the Sergeant-at-Arms should see

Mr. DOLPH. Suppose that the Sergeant-at-Arms should see a Senator present here.
Mr. GRAY. There is no rule providing for that, and we can not act except through a rule.
Mr. DOLPH. If we can act at all on a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms, we can certainly act on his report that the Senators in question are present in this body.
Mr. GRAY. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not a member of this body; he is an administrative officer. He certainly can not modify or control, by his report, facts that may happen to prevail, unless he is authorized to do so.

vail, unless he is authorized to do so.

Mr. DOLPH. When he is instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators, is he not authorized to report that they are present in the Chamber?

Mr. GRAY. He is authorized, as a sheriff is authorized, to summon a party into court. He is authorized and required to make that request, and he may be authorized to use force to compel attendance. I say that when that attendance is compelled. and a Senator is brought here in obedience to that order of the Senate, I am not inclined to dispute the contention that his name may be recorded.

Mr. DOLPH. Then there is no way to bring it to the atten-

Mr. DOLPH. Then there is no way to bring it to the attention of the Senate officially that the Senator is here, if the Senator chooses to remain silent.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware whether he means to say, when a Senator is brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and he declines to answer, that the name of that Senator can be counted to make a quorum?

Mr. GRAY. I am not prepared to dispute that contention.

Mr. TELLER. Under the present rules?

Mr. GRAY. Under the present rules?

Mr. TELLER. Under the present rules?
Mr. GRAY. Under the present rules?
Mr. GRAY. Under the present rules. I do not see what else the rule can mean here when it says that the Sergeant-at-Arms can be ordered to compel attendance. For what purpose will we compel that attendance? Not as a mere wanton act of tyranny, not merely to impose a humiliation upon a Senator, but to compel his attendance where? Not anywhere else but here. For what purpose, except it be for the purpose of counting one by his presence here.

Mr. Teller rose.

Mr. GRAY. That is different, if the Senator will pardon me, from the contention that you may impose upon a man the duty or the necessity of assisting and participating in business that he absolutely refuses to participate in, of putting upon him a duty which his conscience, his intellect, or his judgment may repudiate. You can not do that.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me a moment? I will

Mr. GRAY. Mr. MANDERSON. Does not the rule of construction that the Senator suggests lead to this apparently absurd position? As I understand him, the Senator who is present and does not

As I inderstand fifth, the Senator who is product answer "here" is absent.

Mr. GRAY. I did not say so.

Mr. MANDERSON. And that the Senator who is brought here to the bar of the Senate, under the order of the Senate. his presence being compelled, can be recorded although he stands mute? Does not that make the only safe place of refuge, the Senate Chamber itself, where a Senator who desires to take refuge can, on the record, say that he is absent from the Chamber?

Mr. GRAY. That is quite possible. I am not defending the present rule. I am considering how far the present rule covers the various exigencies which we may be brought to face. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that he thought the rule covers those exigencies. I have given my opinion, in a somewhat offhand manner, and subject to further reflection and consideration, that when a Senator is brought here by the Sergeant-at-Arms, the rule prescribing that the Senate may order the Sergeant-at-Arms to compel the Senator's attendance, there can be no object in that rule, no sensible construction to be given to it, except to compel the attendance of the Senator whenever his presence in this Chamber may contribute to a quorum. That

But I am prepared to go further, and say that I have here an amendment prepared, which I thought I might offer to the Senane and have printed for its consideration, to cover just the case, which I admit is a casus omissus in the rules, as mentioned by the Senator from Nebraska. I agree with the Senator that the rule, as it at present exists, does permit the absurdity which he has disclosed

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the peculiarity of the language, not only of the rule, but of the constitution, upon which the rule, of course, is based; the constitutional provision being that each House-may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members

Then, coming to the rule itself, the language is that-

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not

Not that a quorum is not answering to their names on the roll

Mr. GRAY. Where is the Senator reading from?
Mr. MANDERSON. Rule V, section 3. Then the Senator rule, following the language of the Constitution, provides for compelling the attendance of absent members. Does presence mean only presence evidenced by word of mouth?
Mr. GRAY. It does, under this rule.
Mr. MANDERSON.

Mr. GRAY. It does, under this rule.
Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think so. If that be so, then we come to the absurd position that a man is here in his absence. If that be so, then I do not believe we can defend any such construction.

Mr. GRAY. I am not defending the omissions of the rule. In fact I admit that it does not cover all the cases it ought to cover and that we are willing that it should cover. But let me call my friend's attention to the language which he has just brought to my attention, and ask him to scrutinize it a little more closely:

If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll—

We all know what that means-

And shall announce the result,

3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained-

Not ascertained by view, not ascertained in any other way than by such roll call. Does not that include everything class. So that, Mr. President, I admit that this rule does not go far enough, that it does not meet that defiance of the rule which is made when a Senator, sitting in his place, persistently refuses to answer to a roll call. Now, mind you, there is no hardship here, no compulsion. He has to respond to the physical fact of his presence. He is not called upon to vote or participate in any business which he does not understand, we will say, or which for some reason his conscience will not permit. I say that the rules do not go far enough. I have drafted here, which I should rules do not go far enough. I have drafted here, which I should like to read in order to show more concisely my view of this matter, an amendment to Rule V, which proposes, at the end of paragraph 2 of Eule V, after the words, "the Secretary to call the roll and shall anneance the result," to add:

If, before such result is announced, any Senator shall call the attention of the Presiding Officer to the fact that a Senator was present when his name was called and failed to answer, the Presiding Officer shall ask such Senator to state whether he heard his name called by the Secretary; and, if he shall answer in the negative, he shall direct the Secretary to again call the name of such Senator; and, if he shall fail to respond, it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to direct that his name be entered upon the roll as present.

Mr. HILL. With the permission of the Senator, let me ask: Suppose a Senator should fail to respond to the first inquiry? Mr. GRAY. What first inquiry? Mr. HILL. As to whether he heard his name on the call of the roll.

Mr. GRAY. That ought to be provided for. That can be very asily put in. I thank the Senator for suggesting that, for it easily put in. so far to perfect my proposed amendment of the rule in an important particular.

Mr. TELLER. I have been trying for some time to get an opportunity to ask a question, and if the Senator will kindly yield to me for that purpose now, I should like to do so.

Mr. GRAY. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator said, as I understood him, that

Mr. GRAY. I yield.
Mr. TELLER. The Senator said, as I understood him, that a Senator brought into the Chamber by the Sergeant-at-Arms—and that may necessitate another question before I get through can be counted to make a quorum on the roll call, and yet can not be made to participate in the business of the Senate. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. GRAY. To vote?
Mr. TELLER. Suppose the case we had last night, of a Sen-Ar. IELLER. Suppose the case we had last night, of a Senator brought in here whose presence makes a quorum. There upon the question is put on a pending motion on which a quorum had failed to vote, and the Senator remains mute; what, then, is to be done?

Mr. GRAY. I do not quite understand the point of the case put by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I will repeat it. I want to ask the Senator what he would do in this case: A Senator is brought here—
Mr. GRAY. By the Sergeant-at-2-rms?
Mr. TELLER. By the Sergeant-at-Arms. Thereupon his name is entered upon the record, although he refuses to answer to the roll call. Notwithstanding that, his name is entered on the roll call as present. That makes a quorum. Thereupon the vote is taken, as it was last night, on a motion pending, which had before failed for want of a quorum, and the Senator remains muta, what then?

mute, what then?

Mr. GRAY. On the vote?

Mr. TELLER. On the vote.

Mr. GRAY. I have just said that no power under the rules exists, nor do I think there ought to be power under the rule to ompel him to vote.

Mr. TELLER. Then it would seem that there was not very much merit or virtue in that part of the rule which allows a Senator to be brought in here if nothing can be done.

Mr. GRAY. I do not expect to convince the judgment of every Senator. I am very clear in my own mind. There is a provision here for punishing a Senator for not voting. My contention is that when a Senator sits here and declines to vote, declines to participate in a voting quorum, declines to take part in the business here—as that is a matter of judgment; as that is a matter which requires the exercise of his faculties, of his conscience, and his reason—I say that you can not compel him to vote, and I will stand here forever and oppose and denounce, as have before, any attempt to institute an absolutism of that kind in this body

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator fully.
Mr. GRAY. I have had occasion in times past to denounce this method of putting coercion upon a representative of a sovereign State. I denounced it then as a step toward absolutism. I denounce it now. I do not propose to blow hot and cold on

So I differ with the Senator from New York; I differ with a great many able and respectable Senators who claim that there can be in either House of this Congress a state of things in which a in either House of this Congress a state of things in which a law, affecting, it may be, the lives and property of American citizens, can be passed by less than a majority of either House. It is no hardship on anybody, because if there is a majority in favor of any given measure, that majority can always be brought to book. If it can not be, it is not a voting majority. There is no hardship in stating to the one side or the other of this Chamber that if you want to pass a given measure, bring in your quorum here and pass it, and you will always have an opportunity to do it. That is all that I centend for.

tunity to do it. That is all that I contend for.

I do not contend that less than a majority in either House can give the sanction of law, can clothe with imperial majesty a legal enactment that shall govern the American people. Any measure passed by less than a majority, seems to me to violate the sacred traditions of the English-speaking peoples.

The Senator from Nebraska said awhile ago that there was an absurdity in the condition of things produced by the present rule about a quorum, and I admit it. There is an absurdity about it; but there is another absurdity which, follows the contention an absurdity in the condition of things produced by the present rule about a quorum, and I admit it. There is an absurdity about it; but there is another absurdity which follows the contention of my friend from New York. Suppose some bill vital to the interests of this great people, a tariff bill, an election bill, a financial bill, is brought here; suppose there are 85 members of this body, 43 being, under the Constitution, a quorum to do business. What does that mean? To sit here and not do business? Suppose 43 Senators are present in this Chamber. If they all vote for that measure, so far as the Senate is concerned, that measure has received its assent.

measure has received its assent.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose only a majority of that quorum vote for it, then what?

Mr. GRAY. And no others participate in voting?

Mr. GRAY. And no others participate in voting?

Mr. GRAY. I am going to put a question to show the absurdity of it. Suppose, instead of that, that 10 men out of that 43 vote for the given measure, and 33 Senators sitsilent in their seats for reasons, good or bad—good to themselves—does any Senator mean to say that that measure should be clothed with the sanctity of law, so far as the action of the Senate is concerned? Does he mean to say that that is a majority, in the language of the Constitution, for doing that particular business, putting the construction upon their slience that it is acquiesputting the construction upon their stience that it is acquiescence? Oh, no. The matters we deal with are too important for that. We can not trifle with our high duties in that fashion. There is no hardship in requiring, as the Constitution does require, that every measure which is to have the sanctity of law. which is to impose a rule of conduct on American citizens, shall receive the assent of at least a fair majority of each House which constitutes this parliamentary body.

Mr. HOAR. I ask if that proposition, which the Senator thinks unreasonable, is not precisely the proposition affirmed di di si

by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of the United

Mr. GRAY. With all my respect for the Supreme Court, I do not know that I have submitted my judgment and conscience to their keeping. I understand perfectly the case to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers, in which the Supreme Court has said that the constitutional provision that a majority of the members should be a quorum to do business meant a majority present whether they participated in the vote or not.

Mr. HOAR. And that a minority of the whole Senate, forming a majority of those voting, however large or small, made it a constitutional discharge of the Senato's legislative function. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not mean to imply by my question that the Senate or the Senator must accept the judgment of the Senator must accept the judgment. ment of the Supreme Court in regard to that particular constitutional provision; but I thought it desirable, this rule being under consideration, to say that that is a decision which may well commend itself to reasonable minds. The Senate should remember that the Supreme Court were unanimous in that de-

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I can not say with certainty, but I am inclined to think that expression of opinion by the Supreme Mr. GRAY. Court was an obiter dictum.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAY. Whether it was or not, what they attempted to Mr. GRAY. Whether it was or not, what they attempted to decide and did decide, was that each House had under the Constitution a right to make its own rules. So I say that, under the decision of the Supreme Court referred to, either House could make a rule as absurd as the one I have been denouncing here. I am now addressing myself, however, to the judgment, the intellect, and the conscience of my fellow-Senators, and I ask then to read that provision of the Constitution, to consult their own sense of propriety in regard to these legislative matters, and then say whether they are willing that any construction shall be given to a rule we now have, or whether they will give their consent to a new rule, that shall provide that less than a ma-jority is competent to clothe any measure with the forms of

Mr. President, having drawn this distinction between the rules that govern a voting quorum and the rules that govern the presence of a quorum—which I think it is vital should be main-I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I considered it my duty, having very fixed convictions upon this matter, to express them to the Senate and call the attention of Senators, if that has not already been done sufficiently, to this very important ground of discrimination.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not intend, so far as I can reasonably avoid it, to reiterate any of the statements or arguments I had the honor of suggesting during the early part of this debate. We have drifted somewhat from the real point of dispute. Permit me to say, however, at the outset, what I said before, that I do not regard the precise question which we have been debating as involved in the motion of the Senator from Oregon, and that, so far as I am concerned, I am content to allow the Journal to be approved as a correct statement of what actually occurred on yesterday. But this brings us to the whole question involved as to the propriety of changing the rules, and as to the question as to what the rules themselves are. I do not expect to convince any Senator here who has made up his mind absolutely in regard to this question, first, that there is a constitutional question involved, and, secondly, if there is none involved, as a matter of propriety the rules ought not to be changed.

Mr. President, we have different views in regard to the Con-Mr. President, we have different views in regard to the Constitution. The distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan] held a certain view of the Constitution three years ago. He holds the same opinions still. He has not changed; he never changes. Since then, however, the highest court in our land has passed distinctly and directly upon the very question involved and discussed in his letter to Mr. CRISP which was read three years ago, and has again been incorporated in the records of this body. He then took the broad position that the constitutional method of ascertaining a quorum was prescribed by the calling of the yeas and nays and by the responses made thereto, and that that was the only method.

The Constitution of the United States is not what the Senator from Alabama believes it to be; the Constitution of the United States is not what the Senator from New York believes it to be; it is not what any Senator around this circle believes it to be. The Constitution of our country is what the highest court in the land declares it to be. That is the end of the question; but I do not expect to convince Senators around me who have no respect for that high tribunal or who are not willing to bow to its unanimous decision.

I asserted at the outset of this debate that three years ago a foundation for the criticism of the right of the Presiding Officer to count a quorum was the fact that there was something in the Constitution which prevented it. I have read here the decision of the highest court of the country, which says that that right exists; that is, that any method which either House determines exists; that is, that any method which either House determines is the proper method, and that the Constitution does not require responses by yeas and nays as the only method of determining the presence of a quorum.

So far so good. I need not argue any further to Senators who maintain their opinions in defiance of the judgment of the court. There is no use of appealing to them. The question is disposed of so far as they are concerned.

of so far as they are concerned.

As to the next question involved here, to which the Senator from Delaware has alluded, I have only this to say: that I am not disposed to oppose any change in the rules in the way suggested by him. I introduced an amendment to that effect the other day, and various amendments, the object of which is to accomplish the same purpose, have already been introduced by other Sen-ators. They are proper amendments, germane to this question, reasonable in form and shape, and ought to be adopted.

There is nothing inconsistent in the position I assume. Not-withstanding the rules themselves ought to be amended to make the power absolutely certain, nevertheless I submit to the Senate that, under a proper construction of the rules, the right to count a quorum exists now. I prefer that some amendment should be drawn up, something like the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, my own, or that of the Senator from Nebraska; but, in the absence of any amendment adopted, we have a right to insist upon the right to count a quorum, and I think it can be clearly demonstrated that the power already exists.

The Senator from Delaware is obliged to take the position that the rules provide that the only way to ascertain the presence of a quorum is by responses upon the roll call. In answer to the Senator from Delaware, I will state that I understood him to say that he has not gone that far, and yet in another part of his remarks I think he must be considered to have so urged. must take that position, because if the Senator abandons that he has no foundation upon which to stand.

We say the Constitution of the United States speaks of the calling of the yeas and nays, which, of course, can only be done by roll call; but we said three years ago, and we say now, that that was not the only method prescribed by the Constitution to determine the presence of a quorum, but that we had a right by any other method to ascertain whether Senators were present or not.

Upon the first question, as to whether a quorum is present. when it is suggested that a quorum is not present the roll is to be called. The mere fact that the rules say that the roll is to be called determines nothing upon the precise point in dispute. Of course, the roll must be called. There is no other way to proceed. The rule says:

Does it say by responses? No. Is there any method or manner provided as to how that shall be ascertained? customary way has been here, of course, to take the responses; but when you are construing a rule, you should make a broad and liberal construction in the interest of the facilitation of public business. I say—and here is the point in dispute—that this rule specifies no method for that ascertainment. It, therefore, could be done by responses, it could be done by the presence of the member, determined by the eye, or it could be ascertained by the ear. I think that is a sound construction. The Senator from Delaware concedes that his construction of the rule leads

Mr. GRAY. I must beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say that my construction of the rule led to absurd results; but I said such a rule, as it now stands, does not cover a contingency which might lead to absurd results.

Mr. HILL. Which contingency brings about an absurd result, then. It is just as broad as it is long. The Senator concedes the proposition substantially suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, that under the rules a Senator is required to be present in the Senate Chamber and respond to his name. rules provide also or contemplate that he may be punished if he does not obey the rules.

That is the fair construction of the rules themselves; and yet, adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, the only adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, the only safe refuge for a Senator is right here in the Senate Chamber. If he remains away, if he is absent, we can send for him and bring him here; we can request and compel his presence, and yet if he remains here, defies the rules, and refuses to say a word, you are powerless, and, as I understand it, the Senator from Delaware concedes that that is an absurd result. That is the yeary result and construction for which he is contending the very result and construction for which he is contending. Our view of the case is consistent. We simply say that it is the duty of the Senate to give such a construction to the rules as does not make them abourd. We say that we should give them such a construction as will facilitate the public business. Will this not be practical?

I understood my friend from Delaware to go further, and be-coming eloquent (as he occasionally does, and I do not know but often), he said he doubted the right of the Senate, as a matter of propriety, to count a Senator as present, or any purpose when he did not desire to have his presence made part of the record. Did the Senator not say that?

Mr. GRAY. I did not put it that way. Mr. HILL. Of course, the Senator put it in a little different way.

Mr. GRAY. I said a Senator could not be counted as participating in the proceedings when he declined to vote.

Mr. HILL. I understood that the Senator thought that no Mr. HILL. I understood that the Senator thought that no rule should be passed in this body which would make a Senator

Mr. GRAY. No. I said I did not believe, with my view of constitutional law and of what the Constitution requires, that any measure could become a law unless it received a vote of a majority of the body majority of the body.

Mr. HILL. If that be so, it is by virtue of some constitutional provision, or by virtue of some statute or something.

Mr. GRAY. It is by virtue of that principle that majorities shall rule, which the Senator has previously alluded to.

Mr. HILL. A majority rules in almost every other place except in the Senate of the United States.

But here I want to read to the Senate from the same decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Of course, I assume that the Senator has great respect for that tribunal, and that its decisions are entitled to be observed and respected by this body. "The Constitution says a majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum.

Here is the judicial construction of that provision of the Constitution. I read-

In other words, when a majority are present, the House is in a position to do business; its capacity to do business is then established, created by the mere presence of a majority, and does not depend upon the disposition or assent or action of any single member, or fraction of the majority present. All that the Constitution requires is the presence of a majority, and when that majority is present the power of the House arises.

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator?
Mr. HILL. Yes.
Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator from New York whether the question raised in that case was whether a bill had become a law without the vote of a majority?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. Now, I ask the Senator whether he considers in his high place here, he is not as much bound to consider the Constitution of the United States, so far as it relates to his duty as a Senator, as the Supreme Court of the United States is bound to consider it when they are called upon to construe it with refence to a case between citizen and citizen?

Mr. HILL. I will answer the Senator. The Supreme Court of the United States, being vested with the power to construe the Constitution, it being the final tribunal which can determine these questions, its decisions are binding upon every other department of the Government.

If the Senator will pardon me, I understand, of Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will pardon me, I understand, of course, that a decision of the Supreme Court is binding to this extent; that where it has by a judgment given a certain interpretation to the Constitution it is idle to contend that in another case, or in the class of cases involving the same question, that that rule so interpreted by the court should not apply; and therefore, in regulating the conduct of the citizen, he must conform to that interpretation of the Constitution; but in this body, where we are called upon under the Constitution to decide what our powers are, does not the question address itself to the conscience of every Senator whether the Constitution warrants the action proposed or not?

Mr. HILL. To some extent that may be true; to a larger extent it is not true. If the rule contended for by the Senator is correct, if the Supreme Court should declare certain provisions of the Constitution to mean one thing, the House of Representa-tives declare them to mean another, the Senate another, and citizens generally another, you would have confusion in all departments of the Government and amongst the people themselves.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator if the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that a bill against which a majority had recorded its vote, and in favor of which a minority had recorded its vote, had become a law, whether he would feel himself bound by that decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. HILL. I expect always to be bound in my private and public capacity by the decisions of the highest tribunal in the land. I make explicit and frank answer upon that subject.

I ask the Senator another question. While he may think that this question was not directly involved, as he intimated, I think he said it was, and so claimed, no matter what view he may perso said it was, and so craimed, no interewhat view he may personally take of the Constitution, the Senator will be frank enough to say to the Senate that what I have read from this decision corroborates the argument which I make; does it not?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly; it corroborates it by very high au-

Mr. HILL. I do not want any other corroboration than that

Mr. GRAY. But I wish to say that the Constitution of the United States requires the Senate to make its own rules; and when I ask the Senator if he has a distinct notion, as I have, that the Constitution does not warrant this body in prescribing that less than a majority shall give the sunction of law to a measure, whether he considers the Supreme Court of the United States could control his conscience in that respect?

Mr. HILL. It is hardly a question of conscience; it is a question of construction; it is a question which depends upon the intellect. All great legal questions arising out of the construction of the Constitution must be submitted to some tribunal. Is each individual Senator to set up his conscience upon a construction of disputed constitutional questions of this character? I think

Mr. GRAY. Can we not make our own rules?
Mr. HILL. You can make your own rules: but whether your rules conform to the Constitution of your country, depends upon the decision of that tribunal designated by the Constitution which has power to determine the question. So much for that. All the point that I desire to elicit, and which I have elicited, and the views which I have presented here, the Senator concedes are sustained by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. With that I am content.

United States. With that I am content.

Look at the situation which will be found by the rules. The yeas and mays are ordered upon a question. The roll is called; 42 Senators answer one way or the other, and another, a forty-third Senator, asks to be excused from voting. The RECORD shows the fact. The question is put to the Senate as to whether this forty-third Senator shall be excused. A roll call is had upon it. He is excused from voting or he is not excused, and a certain disposition is then made of the question. What do you say? You say that there is an absurd result; that there was not a quorum present when 42 Senators have answered to their names, and there was another Senator present, who was excused from voting, are you to say that by some sort of legerdermain this

Why do Senator was not deemed in law to be present?
Why do Senators take such a strained construction, which makes your rules and our proceedings ridiculous? I trust I am not reflecting upon the Senate by that suggestion. I am adopting that argument, to some extent, of other Senators. I say under your rules here, if you excuse a Senator, or if his pair is announced, in all such cases the record of your proceedings show that that Senator is present. If his name be added to those who actually vote there is a quorum present, and it seems to me the Constitution is complied with.

Bear in mind I have not contended in this debate, and do not contend now, that you can count any Senator for the purpose of adding to the vote given. Upon that there is no dispute. A Senator can remain in his seat and be silent, and of course you can not count him as voting upon one side or the other when he does not vote. All we contend is that so long as he is here, as long as the physical fact exists, he shall be counted to make a quorum; as the physical fact exists, he shall be counted to make a quorum; we contend that he shall not be here and place himself in a position where he can not be reached by the decree or action of this body. That is all. What is the objection to that? I have as much respect for the rights of minorities as the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Delaware. I can not, however, agree with them that the construction for which I contend wrongs any Senator.

If there is a Senator here who regards it as his duty to come here and obstruct the proceedings of the body he may be injured; if there is a Senator here who thinks his duty to his constituents is discharged by coming here and refusing to obey the rules, refusing to vote, then he is the one that I would do injustice to. That is true. But I can not see in the light of common sense why we should contend for absurd literal construction. is not a question of minorities or majorities. Men are not deprived of any right when they are given an opportunity to par-ticipate, and when they voluntarily refuse to participate in our proceedings. What right can they urge when they defy our rules? What position can they take here when they attempt to obstruct the business of this body?

Mr. President, I have thus contended for a plain, commonsense, reasonable construction of these rules, a construction which makes them consistent throughout, which avoids the reaching of absurd results.

I heard my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] speak of his great respect for the Constitution. He has no more respect for that instrument than I have; but I can not see that any Senator has a right to shield himself behind the Constitution when he seeks to obstruct the public business of this great tion when he seeks to obstruct the public business of this great legislative body. I shall have no personal controversy with the distinguished Senator from Alabama, although I think from some of his remarks, possibly from some of his little flings, that he courted it. I know he spoke perhaps contemptuously of the politicians, as he called them, of the great State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. There are politicians in the State of New York, and there are good politicians there; there are mon when we have honored for many years, and they there are men whom we have honored for many years, and they do not deny that they are politicians in the highest and best sense of the term. I suppose there are no politicians in Alabama; that they are all statesmen down in that country. [Laugh-

My friend said that he did not care to have the politics of New York imitated in this Chamber. I do not know what he meant by that fling—some reflection, possibly, upon the Democratic party of the great Empire State. I tell him, sir, the elections in our State are as honest as they are in the State of Alabama or elsewhere. It does not lie in the mouth of that Senator, if what was said as to the election last fall in the great guberatorial contest in his State of Kolb vs. Jones be true, to speak of elections in the State of New York. [Laughter.]

But I shall not digress from the principal point involved in this controversy. The Senator from Alabama spoke—yea boasted—of his Helong devotion to the Constitution of the United States. It may be so a Lauppend that for a very high paried States. It may be so. I supposed that for a very brief period my friend was supporting another constitution; but I may be mistaken. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Not at present.

The Senator spoke of the wrongs that were about to be perpetrated by this body in the passage of the pending bill. If his trated by this body in the passage of the pending bill. If his contention about these rules is correct, then there is no possible danger of any wrong being perpetrated, because if the view taken by him is correct there seems to be no method provided by which we can reach a result. Therefore, if that is true, he can with the utmost safety repeat the statement in imitation of another distinguished Senator from that State, that if we pass another distinguished Senator from that State, that if we pass the pending bill in the manner suggested by me and permitted under a construction of the rules, we must walk over his dead body. I do not believe it. It is an idle threat. I have heard of statesmen before who were going to die in the last ditch, but there are some of them alive now. [Lughter.]

Mr. President, I did not cite the decision of the Supreme Court for the supreme of untagoing the given of the Senator from for the purpose of antagonizing the view of the Senator from Alabama. I simply cited it for the purpose of showing how they differed. I am a good deal in the position of the lawyer who was arguing a case before a justice of the peace, and the who was arguing a case before a justice of the peace, and the justice was very obstinate in maintaining his view of the law. Finally the lawyer read a chapter from Blackstone, and then apologized for it by saying: "I do not read this for the purpose of showing that your honor is wrong, but for the purpose of showing what a fool Blackstone was." [Laughter.] So I cite this decision not to show that the Senator from Alabama is wrong—because he is always right and everybody else is wrong—but for the purpose of showing what a fool the Supreme Court of the United States has made of itself in making this decision, which the Sanator from Delaware says he concedes auscision, which the Sanator from Delaware says he concedes auscision. cision, which the Senator from Delaware says he concedes sustains the position I have taken upon this floor. So much for that question.

The Senator from Delaware said that he would not follow in any scheme which has a tendency towards anarchy, and he intimated that some of the suggestions made here were in that direction. I do not ask him to go so far; I do not ask any Senator to do anything harsh or improper, or which can not be justified by law and precedent.

I do submit that the time is soon coming, it ought to be here now at the close of this great debate, when the majority in the Senate, composed of Democrats and Republicans in favor of the passage of the repeal bill, must see what they can do in regard to its passage, must determine upon some course by which a vote can be reached.

We are told by these gentlemen that we are powerless. It may be so. I think that this debate is a proper one, that we should seek to determine what course we can take within the rules and under the Constitution and under the ordinary principles of parliamentary law to pass this repeal bill.

I he ard the distinguished Senator from Alabama paying his just tribute to the distinguished Senators who occupied seats in this Chamber in years gone by. I agree with all he said in regard to the greatness of those former Senators. He spoke affection at all y and eloquently of the grand Old Roman from Ohio, who occupied a seat in this Chamber for so many years. He can not say anything that I would not indorse in regard to that Democratic statesman, who possesses the confidence and respect of the Democracy and the people of the Union.

I suppose, when the Senator paid that tribute he had in view all the record made by Mr. Thurm in this body. I suppose he did not intend to pick out a few taings which he did, but that he had reference to all of them. Sir, the course towards anarchy, which the Senator from New York is said to be marking out, is the very course which Allen G. Thurm in pursued in this body; and if the Senator from Alabama has that respect which he professes for that great statesman, then I ask him to follow the line which he marked out in the first session of the Fortysixth Congress

I hold in my hand the record of those proceedings. there was some filibustering in those days as now. At the particular time to which I refer the filibustering saems to have been partially upon the Republican side. On pages 235, 236, and 237, June 19, 1875, the Senate was going through the same proceeding which we were going through last evening; that is, having roll calls for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present.

The following record is taken from the Journal of the Senate: THURSDAY, June 19, 1879.

Mr. President, there is the precedent which I shall ask this body to imitate at some future day. I said the question was not really involved on the motion here this morning. Sir, such men as Thurman and others are the distinguished men whom I propose to follow, rather than the lead of the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should be very willing, indeed, before I make the brief observations which I intend to make, to have the pending question disposed of. If there be no objection and no desire to debate this question upon the adoption of the amendment to the rules, I shall give way to a vote. If, however, any Senator wishes to debate the question further I shall proceed. I hope, as this question is a privileged one, standing in the way of everything else, that we may now have a vote upon the question of the adoption of the amendment to the Journal or a motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DOLPH. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays. should much prefer that the question should be taken upon the amendment by yeas and nays; but if we are called upon to vote to lay it on the table I shall call for the yeas and nays. It will not cut off debate, because the question of the approval of the Journal is debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] to lay the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator wish to debate the ques-

Mr. DOLPH.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not care to debate it further. Mr. WASHBURN. If we can have a direct vote, that will satisfy me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Oregon moves to amend the Journal. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay that motion on the table. That question is not debatable.

Mr. DOLPH. I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he will not withdraw that motion? There are several Senators here who would like to say a few words upon the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to cut off anyone. to be further debate on the motion to correct the Journal, I shall proceed.

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon is withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask to have the motion proposed by the Senator from Oregon reported, so that we may under-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Illinois that the motion of the Senator from Oregon is to amend the Journal. The Secretary will read the amendment. The Secretary read as follows:

That the name of Senator ALLEN be recorded in connection with said roll call to show ais prese ce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the pending question. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr.SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to debate that question, because think it has been sufficiently debated. I am of the opinion expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that whatever may be the merits of the proposition—and Iconeur and sympathize entirely with the proposition made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]—yet I think upon the face of the rule, which we must construe according to its fair meaning, I should feel bound to vote against the proposition to amend the Journal, because I think the Secretary has executed his duty honestly and according to the rule, and that it would be an unjust reproach upon him to say that he had not strictly conformed to the rules of the Senate. Therefore, I shall vote against the proposition of the Senator from Oregon, although I sympathize Wishing to make a few remarks in regard to the present situation of the public business, and especially the great question which is now pending before us, I desire to waive the question immediately before us, and discuss that which has been discussed so often of late, that is, the nature and character of our sulce.

The rules of the Senate are made to expedite the public business in an orderly and proper manner. There is no doubt of the right and the necessity of every legislative body to have the exclusive power over its rules.

What is the object of the rules of the Senate and of all legislative bodies? It is to enable them to legislate. object. We are not here for any other purpose except to legislate, to make laws, in connection with the coordinate departments of the Government, in cooperation with the House of Representative, and subject to the veto of the President. All the rules ought to aim for the accomplishment of that purpose and no other.

At the same time, while that is the primary object of all rules, yet it is equally important to give the minority full and free opportunities of debate. The right to debate a question brough has been recognized by the Senate of the United States from the beginning of our Government; but when the rules of this body, intended to expedite legislation, are used as an obstruction by the minority in order to defeut the will of the majority, those rules should as soon as possible be corrected, changed, and al-

Whenever the minority presses its means of obstruction unduly, it then creates what is in the nature of a revolution, it seeks to break down the rules of the Senate, and to use them as a means of denying to the majority of the Senate its power to make laws for the people of the United States. Mr. President, I know that the recent obstructions made during this heated contest, lasting now for more than two months, have gone far beyond all which has occurred while I have been a member of this body. I have recently seen measures resorted to here which were never heretofore appealed to during my term of service, nor do I believe they have ever been prac-

The Senate of the United States was originally a dignified body of twenty-six members, more like a council of revision than a legislative body. In all its history it threw down the usual barriers against debate and went to the extreme verge of liberative between the council of the council o ality. But, Mr. President, whenever the time comes when our rules of order do not promote legislation, then, as a matter of course, the Senate must adopt rules which will prevent obstruction. In the olden time no such thing happened as has occurred during the present session of Congress

I shall not refer to that further, for each Senator can see for himself that this new idea of stopping a Senator in the midst of his argument to suggest that a quorum is not present is a marked discourtesy that in former times would have been resented. It has been done merely for delay. The purpose in a large majority has been done merely for delay. The purpose in a large majority of the cases when a Senator was stopped in the midst of his argument to have the roll called was to catch Senators at their lunch or within hearing, merely to obstruct and delay a vote. This is a violation of the duty of a Senator, and ought to subject him, by our rules, to reproach and punishment.

When was that ever done in the olden times? When was a when was that ever done in the olden times? When was a Senator in those days ever stopped in the midst of his argum at every five or ten minutes in order to call a quorum here? That kind of obstruction has never been resorted to. Sometimes, as I know, it has occurred that Senators have refused to vote when they were present. In such cases, in my judgment, they have violated the rules of good order. I say for myself, and I can refer to the records of the Senate to sustain me, that never, when I have been present here, have I refused to east my vate, even al-In the records of the Senate to sustain me, that never, when I have been present here, have I refused to cast my vote, even although the majority might have been against me. That was not the idea in those days, but the practice has grown up within the last fifteen or twenty years. The first violation of this rule occurred in the case referred to here a few moments ago, where my former colleague, Mr. Thurman, when President of the Senate, stepped into the breach and counted a quorum. Up to that time I believe a case had never occurred when Senators sat silent in their seats. That was probably the first time. I was not then in their seats. That was probably the first time. I was not then a member of the Senate.

Mr. President, during the pendency of all the war measures and the reconstruction measures, we had many long and weary night sessions at a time when I was much better able than now to bear that kind of fatigue. I have many a time sat here until the gray of the morning hour after hour. the gray of the morning hour after hour. But in every case, until within the last ten or twelve years, there was finally an agreement between the minority and the majority, the minority yielded, and a time fixed when a vote should be had. If a single of the kind occurred where the minority did not yield af fair debate before the pendency of what is called the force bill. I should like to know when it was. At that time the largest liberty of debate was given, and when debate was apparently exhausted, then it was that an agreement occurred at once between the opposing sides, an hour or a day was fixed when the vote should be taken, and that was the end of obstruction.

I do not know of a single measure in those times, when the most momentous questions were pending before the Senate of the United States which were ever presented in our history, when the time did not speedily come when the minority, having made its protest and made its arguments, yielded to the majority and surrendered to them the unquestioned power of the majority to pass laws, whether in the opinion of the minority they were wise or unwise.

This system of obstruction, therefore, is a matter of modern origin in the Senate of the United States. In the House of Representatives, of which I had the honor many years ago to be a member, we did organize measures of obstruction; but the previous question existed there, and whenever the majority chose to do so they could put it in force and establish for themselves the time of voting. Such an extremity was never resorted to in the Senate. If Senators will look over the pages of our Congressional history, to be found in the Globe and the RECORD, they will find in every single case that the majority in the end have had the power to pass laws when that majority was well established. If there be any case to the contrary, I shall be very glad indeed to have it pointed out, for I recollect no such case.

Mr. President, I think, therefore—though probably it may not be done at this session—that the time has arrived when the Senate of the United States must adopt rules and regulations to revent obstruction of the public business.

The Senate is a very different body now from what it was in the olden times; not in point of ability, for I believe the Senate of the United States to-day has more varied talent and has as much ability to discharge all the duties of this great law-making body as it ever has had. I believe in the general intelligence of its members, and in their ability. It is equal to any Senate which ever sat here. We are improving in our day and generation, possessing many advantages which our ancestors did not possess.

So the difficulty is not on account of the weakness or want of intelligence of the Senate, but on account of its numbers. A body of eighty-eight Senators is very different from a body of twenty-five or fifty Senators. During the war and the reconstruction period twenty-five was a quorum of this body. It was only necessary, therefore, to consult twenty-five Senators in order to establish a rule or to secure the order of business. Now that the body has increased to eighty-eight Senators, it is much more difficult.

I believe I can say that there is no legislative body in the world which has not some power to close debate, some cloture rule, some means by which the majority can pass laws. If there be a legislative body which has not that power, I should like to know it

We must follow, therefore, the examples of other political bodies; we must follow the example recently set by the House of Commons of England and also set by the House of Representatives of the United States. Such rules exist in the legislative bodies of France and in all countries where they have organized legislative bodies. There are many more such governments now than forty or fifty years ago. The great body of European governments was then monarchial. Now many of them are republican, and all of them possess the power of legislation. Most of them have two legislative houses, similar to our own. In this respect our example has been followed by almost every intelligent monarchy in Europe. No longer does a czar or a king pronounce his law, but in every European government he is restrained by the legislative body. In every legislative body of Europe which I have knowledge, there is a power to suppress debate, or rather not to suppress it so much as to limit it within the bounds of reason, so as to provide that the majority shall exercise the power to pass laws. The Seuate should have some such provision.

Many wise and reasonable provisions have been suggested here. In my own judgment, the better way would be at the next session of Congress—not now, in the midst of this heated debats—to have the Committee on Rules strengthened and enlarged, and have them take up and reëxamine all these various rules and provide for carefully limiting debate, giving to the minority the full power and proper opportunity to express their opinions, and prescribe some reasonable method by which the majority, after that limit has been reached, may prescribe the time when the final vote shall be taken.

Mr. President, I wish now very briefly to call your attention to the important legislation which must be acted upon here. We have been here over two months, and not a single thing has been done, not a single measure of the slightest importance has been passed. The House of Representatives has performed its duty, while this body, which has been here staggering under this long, long debate, has as yet been unable to have a single vote on any question presented upon which any difference of opinion exists.

Sir, if this continues, the Senate of the United States will be a marked body; it will no longer command the respect of an intelligent and active people like ours. Our people are people of action in every department of industry in this country, and the Senate of the United States ought not to be the great log which weighs down and obstructs legislation. We must, therefore, resort to some means by which the power of the majority may be exercised. Whether I shall be in the minority or the majority, I shall be willing to obey the will of the majority.

majority, I shall be willing to obey the will of the majority. Now, for the first time during my service as a member of the Senate of the United States, I recognize on the other side of this Chamber the power of the Senate. They have the majority; the responsibility rests upon them; the duty rests upon them. They say they can not agree. They must agree, or else surrender their political power. If the Senate of the United States as now organized can not make laws without this prolonged debate, if the majority say they are unable to meet together and formulate some proposition, the people of the United States will take them at their word. There is no doubt about that.

I have sat here for more than a month without opening my

I have sat here for more than a month without opening my mouth, desiring to hear from the other side who have been honored by a majority of the people with the control of the Senate of the United States. The President has expressed his opinion. We, on this side, have not obstructed the engrafting into law what is desired by the President. We do not believe in him; we do not believe in his policy; we are under no obligations to him, and yet we furnish nearly two-thirds of the votes to enact the law he desires to have enacted, while the party he represents stands unable to formulate a policy and say what they desire. If they do not agree with the President, let them say so, and formulate their opinions into an act.

There are three or four important matters of public interest which demand solution, and this body stands in the way. One is, whether or not we should continue the purchase of silver bullion

Upon that question honest men may differ. I believed in that policy; I believed in giving to it the largest and most beneficial experiment. We have tried it, and, according to our humble judgments, without wishing to say anything harsh about silver or about the questions now involved, we think on the whole it is not wise to further continue the purchase of silver bullion.

We have now 570,000,000 silver dollars coined, or we have the bullion to coin it. We have $77,000,000 of silver coin in wide circulation, called subsidiary coin, and we have bullion enough now to supply all that can be coined in the next two or three years. Therefore, when we acquiesce in the views of the President that the purchase of silver bullion tends to create a disturbance in the markets of the world, tends to create a want of confidence in our ability to maintain the parity of gold and silver, we say: "Very well; we have tried the experiment of purchasing silver bullion, and we believe it has failed; silver has declined, notwithstanding our enormous purchases, and we shall therefore vote to suspend the purchase of silver bullion, not to demonetize silver coin."

Senators all around me, on both sides of this question, have assumed that we are about to demonetize silver when we propose to suspend the purchase of silver bullion. We have more silver now in the United States of America than we ever had before in our whole previous history, more than we had forty years ago, when silver and gold were the only money of any kind issued by the United States. No one proposes to disturb that silver. There it is, nearly $600,000,000, either in our Treasury, represented by Treasury notes, or among the people, or in bullion ready to be coined. Does anybody propose to disturb that? Oh, no. On the other hand, I shall be glad to join with our friends on the other side of the Chamber to largely increase the subsidiary coin, as it is called. I believe that is the coin which the people of this country a sire more than the large dollar, which is in inconvenient form. We have now in circulation more fractional silver coins than silver dollars.

Any other measure which will tend to promote the use of silver, which will enable us to maintain it at a parity with gold, or

Any other measure which will tend to promote the use of silver, which will enable us to maintain it at a parity with gold, or any other measure which will give employment to this important industry of our country, we are willing and ready to hear and consider. The President suggests, however, that the first and most important measure, before further action, is to clear away the present silver purchasing clause of the act of 1890. We have thought so too, but if the other side do not think so it can not be done, for their vote is potent. They carry the matter in their own hands. Let them agree upon something.

In times past, when they were in the minority and we were in the majority, we never shrank from responsibility. We were Republicans because we believed in Republican principles and Republican men and Republican measures, and whenever a question came into the Senate Chamber to be decided, we never pleaded the baby act and said "we could not agree." We met together in conclave; we measured each other's opinions, some giving way, and finally we came to an agreement. In this way we passed all the great laws which have marked the history of the last thirty years of our country, and it was not done by begging votes of the other side. We knew that, by the usual and almost universal habit of the Democratic party, they would oppose anything we should propose, even the Lord's Commandments or the Lord's Prayer. [Laughter.]

We did not stand in that attitude. We ask our brother Senators on the other side, for whose ability and standing we have the highest respect, to meet together, to consult together, and if they do not like the President's plan, let them, in God's name, give us some other plan, and let them sattle upon it. They can give us some other plan, and let them settle upon it. in that way solve these important questions for the people of our country. Then we on this side will take their plan into consideration, and if we find we can agree with it, we shall. We shall not follow their example, but wherever we can agree with them we shall do so, and if we do not agree with them we shall give them a manly "no."

There are one or two other questions more important than the one I have been discussing, one of which is the necessity of strengthening the gold reserve in our Treasury. We have outstanding $800,000,000 in notes or certificates and but $86,000,000 of gold to redeem them. Think of that for a moment. Senators say they will not increase this reserve, they will not issue bonds to buy it; that the people do not like the idea of increasing the public debt. Senators, the public debt is now increasing day by day. The ordinary revenues do not meet the public expenditures according to the appropriations made by Congress. I have seen to-day, and there is now in the Senate Chamber, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he says distinctly that there will be a deficiency of revenue during this fiscal year at the very lowest of $50,000,000, at the rate of about $5,000,000 a month. That is a debt contracted by the people of the United States, and Congress refuses to furnish the money to meet this growing deficiency. Mr. Carlisle has not a purse long enough to pay these bills, and if he does his duty he will at once—to-day, to-morrow, at the earliest hour—stop the expenditure of all Mr. Carlisle has not a purse long enough to money where it is not imperative, where it is not fixed by law. He ought to suspend the erection of public buildings and the work on all public improvements, and everything of that kind.

The idea of going on and spending at the rate of $5,000,000 a month more beyond the revenues is utterly destructive. It would be destructive in the case of a private individual, and it is utterly indefensible in a Government like ours. The idea that we are not even willing to give our notes for the payment of this money is a monstrous one.

Senators say it will be unpopular to increase the public debt; but it is already contracted. The question is whether we will provide for its payment. This should be done. It ought to be met at once by the Congress of the United States.

Sir, these are public duties that can not be avoided. must decide this silver question some way or other. If you can not do it and will retire from the Senate Chamber we will settle it on this side, and we will do the best we can with our silver friends who belong to us, who are blood of our blood and bone of our bone. But you have the majority on this floor to-day, and therefore I beg of you, not in reproach, not in anger, because I know the great difficulty and the difference of opinion that exists in the two parties; you have the supreme honor of settling this question now, and you ought to do it. That is all I care to say on that point.

Mr. President, I have a great deal of faith in political bodies. Why is the Democratic party organized? Why is the Republican party organized? It is not to express the will of any one man, but it is to express the general opinion of the people of the United States. All of you represent the people, and you seek to observe if possible and carry out their ideas. Whenever men come together as the representatives of a people, they must consider that the differences among the people must be reconciled, and they mustact independent of their people to some extent.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator answer a question I desire to put to him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.
Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know whether he will vote for the unconditional repeal of the entire act called the Sher-

Mr. SHERMAN. No, and no other man who understands the subject would do it. In my judgment to do that would be to dishonor and leave unprotected the $150,000,000 Treasury notes outstanding. To do that would be to throw out of the Treasury the great sum of money that was carried there belonging to the banks for bank redemption. There are many provisions of that bill, bad as some think it to be, that no man in the Senate would vote to repeal if he would read the act carefully and ponder the sub-

The only question in that law that there was any controversy about, the only section of the law that there was ever the slightest dispute about, is the provision providing for the purchase of silver bullion. Every other feature of the law was agreed to unanimously by both Houses of Congress and by the conferees of both Houses. To repeal the whole law would not only be an of both Houses. To repeal the whole law would not only be an absurdity, but I do not believe my honorable friend himself would vote for it if he would study the question in all its details.

Mr. MORGAN. I bog leave to state that I have studied it to my best ability, and I intend to offer that amendment to the pending bill and give you an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall vote against it with the greatest

Mr. MORGAN. I had no doubt the Senator would. Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that two-thirdsof I have no doubt that two-thirdsof your side will vote against it.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be: I do not know: but we shall try it.
Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I want to do. Why Mr. Morkdan. It may be: I do not know; but we shall by the Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I want to do. Why should we not try and vote? Why should we be here seventy-odd days without a single vote on any question? Let us try it. If we would try it to-morrow after all the long debate that has been had and dispose of this question as we think best for the people of the United States, while you are assuming your responsibility we would gladden the hearts of millions of laboring men who are now being turned out of employment. We would relieve the business cares of thousands of men whose whole fortunes are embarked in trade. We would relieve the farmer and his product for free transportation to foreign countries, now clogged for the want of money.

the present condition of affairs there is no money to buy cotton and corn and wheat for foreign consumption. Break down the barrier now maintained by the Senate of the United States, check this viper called obstruction to the will of the majority, give the Senate free power and play, and in ten days from this time the skies will brighten, business will resume its ordi-nary course, and the clouds that lower upon our house will be in the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to trespass upon the indulgence of the Senate more than a single moment.

The Senator from New York [Mr. Hill] seems to think that I have in some way accused him of seeking to promote a condition of anarchy in the Senate or elsewhere. I have only to disclaim any purpose of saying or intending to impute such intention to my friend from New York. But he seems to be laboring under the delusion that his proposition to amend the rules in regard to counting a quorum when a vote is being taken in some way relates to or has bearing upon the difficulties under which we are now laboring in the Senate in order to get a vote on the important measure which has been debated here so long.

Sir, I wish to assure him, and I think I can with entire confidence, that the adoption or rejection of the rule can have no bearing at all upon the unfortunate condition in which we find I, with him, deplore this condition. I, with him, ourselves. I, with him, deplore this condition. I, with him, think that the time has come in which the Senate, in order to maintain its self-respect, in order to maintain its capacity as a law-making body should vote upon the measure now before us; but the proposed amendment to the rules, and the contention made here by the Senator from New York, are entirely academic so far as any result that is sought by those of us who favor the pending repeal measure is concerned. I want to assure him that the rule I have read here as one which will be proposed by me at some convenient time and opportunity has much more rela-tion to producing a state of things it will bring about, and that the most desirable result, than the one proposed by him.

Our trouble, Mr. President, is not in the want of a voting quorum, but in the want of an opportunity to vote at all. Give us the opportunity to vote, and there will be no difficulty about a quorum. The quorum is here; it has been here; it has been waiting all these weeks, in order that it may have the opportunity for which it is anxious to record its vote upon this subject. Therefore, I think the Senator from New York has worked himself up into an unnecessary state of excitement, so far as that is concerned, because there is nothing in that rule which can possibly point toward attaining this desirable result.

I am opposed as much to the absolutism of a minority as to the absolutism of a majority; and I believe that our rules do need amending, in order that when a question has been debated, when debate has exhausted itself (whether it is exhausted now or not), the natural result shall follow of the expression of an opinion on one side or the other as to the merits of a proposition before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Delaware indicate who shall determine when debate has been reasonable?

Mr. GRAY. The common sense of the Senate and the ordinary obligations that rest upon Senators have been sufficient in the past to indicate to the Senate and to Senators when that point is arrived at; and I will not believe that the time has come when those obligations of duty and sense of conscience in regard to the attitude Senators individually occupy here are abdicated and of no account. I still trust that that sense of personal honor and regard for the traditions of this body and of our institutions will produce that result, and I have not charged that it will not.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree entirely with the Senator. I think we are about in that condition now; and I must say that I am a little surprised at the clamor going on in different directions. regard to a change of the rules. It is alleged we are in a state of revolution, obstructing the business, stopping the Govern-I think the sentiment of which the Senator speaks prevails in this body as powerfully now as it ever did.

Mr. GRAY. I am very glad to hear the Senator from South Carolina say so, for in that we agree entirely.

Mr. BUTLER. Unless that power to terminate debate is deposited somewhere, in the Presiding Officer if the Senator chooses, I can see nothing to be gained by a change of the rules

Mr. GRAY. Thave stated as my opinion, as one Senator speaking upon his responsibility to his constituency and to the high place he occupies, that the time has come when a vote should be had upon the pending measure. I do not want to stifle debate. If there is any other Senator in this body who has views to express which he thinks important I have no wish to obstruct the presentation of those views; but when those views have been expressed I want to see the traditions of this body observed, so that there shall be a decent respect by one side paid to the other, and an agreement come to that a vote shall be taken upon a day certain. If that can not be had, then I say that we must somehow and at some time reform our rules so that this matter of coming to a vote may be compelled.

I only rose, Mr. President, for the single purpose of assuring the Senator from New York that I did not suppose he was drifting over to the anarchists, and also to assure him, as I have said, that an amendment to the rules in regard to a voting quorum can have no possible effect in hastening the vote upon the pending measure. While I am upon my feet, recalling what he said about the decision of the Supreme Court, let me put to him in a single sentence what I believe ought to be the attitude of Senators to-ward a judgment of that high tribunal. If that court had decided that Congress can not pass acertain law-that is, that a law which it proposes to pass is not constitutional—then it is idle for us to p isa it; but if he says that we can do a certain thing it does not follow that we are under any obligations to do that thing. It does not decide for us our constitutional duties.

Mr. HILL. I agree with the Senator, but that is not the question we were discussing.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words upon the subject of the proposition to amend the Journal. This whole question of the amendment of the rules is settled very conclusively in the Constitution, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which has been quoted here does not affect the rule provided in the Constitution. The rule of the Constitution requires that the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall at the desire of one-fifth of the members present be entered in the Journal.

Now Mr. President there is nothing in the decision of the

Now, Mr. President, there is nothing in the decision of the Supreme Court that says that if the President of this body shall decide that there is a quorum present, or a single member present, that that is not a question which can be decided by the year and nays, and that the year and nays so recorded upon that question can be nullified by the decision of any presiding officer. The court has not decided that, and if the court had so decided it is not the law of this body, and the decision could have no influence on the exercise of its legislative power by the Senate.

All legislative power is in Congress, and not in the Supreme Court. All judicial power is in the court. Judicial power is to decide cases between parties; to decide the case for the parties, not for other cuses and other parties, or to make the law or the rule of proceeding for Congress. It seems strange to me that such ideas should be propounded here. The judicial power of the United States is extended to cases, and only to cases, before the courts. They may decide to day that the consultation the thing, and it is the law of that case. To-morrow they may decide the same question in another case that it is not the Constitution of the case and law to no one else and nowhere else.

As a question of power, judicial power is confined to the par ties and the case, and h is no place in this body. Respect to the opinions of nine learned men who constitute that tribunal is due to them, respect to the learned men who are the Senators of the United States is due to them. It is coordinate in authority and power, separate and distinct. The Supreme Court has no more power to at in ju gment upon the rules of this body than the President of the United Stat a has. Respect is due to their opinions, but as a question of power I insist that it has no place and say that the Presiding Officer shall decide that a Senator is present when the appeal is made to this body under the Constitution for a ye wand-nay vote to say whether he is present or not gives the power to this body alone. The whole question is prowhat that may be is another question. But the scheme and theory of this body is that it is a representative body, representing the opinion of the people: and that the men who come hero are responsible to their constituents, to the American people, and that is supposed to be a sufficient power to control them.

Then, Mr. President, how are you going to amend these rules

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the decision of Mr. Thurman in the case referred to by the Senator from New York.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the day the Journal of, which was read by the Senator from New York contains the following

The President pro tempore (Mr. Thurman). There is no quorum voting but there is a quorum in the Senate present.

Mr. Conkling. In the opinion of the Chair.

The President pro tempore. There is; the Chair has counted. In the opinion of the Chair, upon reflection, the Chair was in error in causing this, last vote to be taken. That matter belongs to the morning hour. Its very true that if a motion had been made to amend the Journal or to correct the Journal it would be a privileged question that would have to be continued until it was disposed of; but no such motion as that was made.

Mr. Conkling. We had not an opportunity. We do not know what the Journal is.

Then, by unanimous consent, the question went over without ny action. No legislative action was taken. There was nothing any action. done and the President of the Senate only said: "In the opinion of the Chair there is a quorum present not for legislative purposes, but in colloquy between Mr. Coakling and Mr. Thurman, the President pro tempore of the Senate."

Then, to show that there was no attempt on the part of Mr. Thurman to decide that there was a quorum present by his counting without a roll call, Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, I suppose by this time it must be evident to the majority of the Senate that they can not coerce the minority of the Senate to do what the minority thin a they do not want todoor out the not to do. This proceeding can go on just as long as the majority of the Senate choose to have it go on, and it may stop whenever they choose to stop it. The minority of every legislative body are driven at times to stand on their reserved rights, and as to those rights they are the exclusive judges.

I will not read further, but for three months that action had been continued and continued under the auspices of the distinguished leaders of the other side of the Chamber and the same amendment to the rules. The same propositions were made and met by distinguished Republicans and Democrats, and the same argument was made that has been made here to-day, and replied to on both sides, with the proposition that this rule of the Constitution, giving the right of a yea-and-nay vote upon any and every question on the demand of one fifth of the members, was an absolute b rrier to any change in the rules.

Why shall the Presiding Officer see a Senator here and count him for the purpose of a quorum, and for no other purpose, and if that quorum does not vote, of what avail shall the rule say that he shall be declared present? The purpose of this provision manifestly is that there shall be a quorum, a voting power in the body, for nothing can be done without a voting power. You can not pass a bill by a minority of a quorum. The Constitution fixes that. I presume the Supreme Court and no one else would undertake to declare that less than a majority of a quorum is a legislative power in this country. Of what avail, then, these propositions that are made for a change of the rules in this re-Every change of this rule can not deprive one-fifth of this body of the right to demand a yea-and-nay vote, nor can any rule give the right to any Presiding Officer to declare that yea-an i-nay vote null and void and of no effect.

Then. Mr. President, as the rule stands and as the body stands now, unless there be a dem and by one-fifth of the number present for a yea-and-nay vote, the President of this body can declare that a measure is carried when every vote is against it, and is shall be so entered in the Journal. He is absolute in his power over the Journal unless a yea-and-nay vote shall disclose the contrary, for it must be by unanimous consent. One-fifth of this body who are voting are required as the power to call for a record by yeas and nays. The Journal will record everything that is declared by the Presiding Officer of this body until the contrary is placed upon the record by the demand of one-fifth, which alone can require it to be placed there.

So the President of the Senate may now say when there is no Senator present in this body, that there is a quorum present, and it may be entered upon the Journal, but if there is anybody here who will require that the vote shall be taken. If there is anybody here to require that the Journal shall be truly stated, one-fifth of this body can call for what? Not for his declaration, but for the constitutional record of the ye us and mays. What is a yea and may? It is the calling of the roll and the response of the members recorded upon the Journal, and so the Constitution de-

Therefore, Mr. President, as a matter of reason and argument the constitutional requirement is absolute and covers the entire ground. So the authority of Mr. Thurman can not be invoked upon this So the authority of Mr. Thurman can not be invoked upon this proposition. He did not attempt to declare potentially, authoritatively, for legislative purposes, that he had the right to count a quorum. He declared as a matter of opinion, in a colloquy between him and Mr. Conkling, that there was in this body a sufficient number of Senators to constitute a quorum. He did not decide that they could proceed to legislative business, and they did not so proceed. He decided that the requirement of the amendment of the record at that time was not in order, and it was assented to by Mr. Conkling and by the other Senators pres-

So, Mr. President, the proposition that this body is to be controlled by the opinion of the nine learned men who are judges for life of the Supreme Court of the United States, either in respect of its powers, to its rules of proceeding, to the method in which it shall exercise the legislative powers conferred upon it. or in respect of the necessity of changing these rules, is without any kind of force. If the Supreme Court should declare less than a majority of a quorum could enact a law, while it would be the law in that case it would be an outrage which would demand of this boly the exercise of its constitutional power to see that the Constitution of the United States was respected and enforced. Mr. HOAR. I wish to utter only one sentence, and that is in regard to the opinion of the Supreme Court. I think a correct statement of that doctrine is this: While the opinion of the Supreme Court does not bind any Senator except as a very respectful precedent, it does settle conclusively for all mankind that if we choose to pass a law in that way it is a valid law which the American people must obey.

Mr. CALL. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the Supreme Court had declared the next day that it was not a valid law, would not that be the law of the case, as the former law was of that case; and if on the third day they were to rendera decision that neither of them were constitutional, would not that be the

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly. What the Senator supposes is entirely true; but, in other words, it seems to me it is a pretty serious consideration for the Senate to determine what course it may pursue if it see fit. If we see fit to pursue a certain course for any reason which binds our judgment and conscience in en-acting a law, that will be a valid law so long as the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States stands.

Mr. CALL. Now, I will ask the Senator if the question of judicial power is not confined absolutely to the case and the parties before it as a question of power?

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. It is a binding precedent; it will govern every State court; it will govern every executive officer; it will govern inferior courts. It will, of course, be no law of the land after it is repealed, but it stands as the law of the land until repealed.

Mr. CALL. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him to interpret the phrase of the Constitution, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treates made."

Mr. HOAR. And in all cases of law arising under the Constitution it shall be held that an act of Congress passed in the state of the constitution is shall be held that an act of Congress passed in the state of the constitution is shall be act as with the House of Representatives.

manner in which the late law in the House of Representatives was passed, in the manner in which it is proposed by some Senators to pass a law here, is a valid standing law for all mankind.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Mas achusetts reasons too well and too accurately to state that proposition. He must know as a matter of power that the law of the case is decided for the case: and if it b) true that to-morrow between two other parties the same court may decide precisely the contrary of what they decided to-day, then he must admit the conclusion as inevitable that under the Constitution and nature of the power that it extends no further than to the case and the parties which were before

If the Supreme Court, a life tribunal, absolute in its exercise of power, can by its decision make a new constitution every day, then they are the Government and our cathe should be to obey them and their decisions instead of the Constitution.

The Constitution creates a government of coordinate powers, and makes the legislative power the chief and paramount authority in that it confides to the Congress power to impeach and remove from office both the judicial and the executive officers when they transgress and abuse the authority confided to them; and to render this power effective to Congress alone does it give the power to maintain armies, to levy taxes, and grant supplies. It is here and in this power that the people have received their

of all its powers.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, this discussion falls far short of relieving the present situation. If it be admitted that Sen tors sitting in their places and refusing to vote may be counted as a quorum, if it be admitted that the Senate can compel Senators by the infliction of punishment upon them to cast their vote, by the infliction of punishment upon them to cast their vote, still that does not reach a solution of the question now pending before this body, because if every member of the senate were brought into the body and the doors locked and they kept here, still there are rules now in existence that will enable a minority to prevent a majority from reaching a conclusion until the 4th day of March, 1895. If it is desired by amanding the rules to enable a majority of this body to reach a conclusion and vote on the pending bill, then there must be some more stringent rule. the pending bill, then there must be some more stringent rule provided than that proposed by the Senator from New York.

It is useless for us to talk about what is a proper construction It is useless for us to talk about what is a proper construction of the Constitution on the question of counting a quorum. It is true the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the Speaker can count a quorum, but that had not been the rule obtaining in either this body or the other body for one hundred years. No Speaker of the House of Representatives up to the Fifty-first Congress had ever supplemented the roll call by counting a quorum as being present. Mr. Speaker Bl ine, when the question was put before him repeatedly in the great civil rights contest in the Forty-fourth Congress, positively and unequivocally refused to make the count. Over and over again did he recuse to make it; and when it was stred that in various legislative bodies of States the speakers had been empowered legislative bodies of States the speakers had been empowered by the rules of those legislative bodies to make such a count in addition to the record count, his reply was that it had been the cause of more legislative frauds than anything else which had been done in the whole government.

It seems to me that when the courts came to review this question peculiar to the legislative department of the Government they should have adhered to a well established rule of construction and held that as the body itself h.d for a century maintained the opposite, that should be accepted as the proper construction of its powers. But, as I said, it is a matter of the least consequence

Suppose all the Senators are here present, a motion to go into executive session, a motion to djourn, a motion to fix the day to which the Senate shall adjourn may be alternated until the present Cong ess expires, and the Senate can not reach a vote. Something has got to be done. Either the majority on this floor will have to submit to the control of the minority or the ma-jority will have to exercise the power given to them by the Constitution to do business. It is not the minority that are charged by the Constitution to do business. The majority have no right to compel the attendance of a minority, to throw upon its shoulders the responsibility of doing business. It is majori-ties that are charged by the Constitution to do business in these There is a ma ority here and there is a majority in the other branch, a majority defined by line on great questions, and upon their shoulders is devolved the responsibility, and an intelligent public opinion will hold them responsibile for not doing

I do not believe, sir, we have the right to compel a member who sits in his seat to vote. I never have believed it. It has been tried in vain in this Government from its foundation to the resent time, and it has never succeeded in a single instance. The right of a member to vote is a right given to him by his constituency to protect their rights, and it must be left to his own judgment and his own conscience whether he can better protect the rights of his people by withholding his vote. If he thinks he can, then a majority have no more right to compel him to vote than they have to determine how he shall vote.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator what function or vital

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator what function or vital power he attributes to the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the compulsion of the attendance of absent members in both House of Congress if the person whose attendance is compelled can refuse in all respects to perform the duty?

Mr. MILLS. I have heard that question asked before, and I will answer my friend. It has just this significance, the power was given in the Constitution to compel the attendance of a quorum, and when a quorum is present it rests upon the faith of the institutions of this country that when a majority is present it will transact the business of the country; and it is, I think, for them to determine whether they will vote or not. Let me ask my friend from Massachusetts a question. Suppose all the ask my friend from Massachusetts a question. Suppose all the people of the United States should refuse to go to the polls and vote, what are you going to do? Suppose every officer in the Government refuses to hold office when appointed, what are you going to do?

Mr. HOAR. If the Constitution of the United States provided that every citizen of the United States might be compelled to go to the polls, I should understand that the power to compel him involved the power to compel him to vote when he got there, that that was the purpose of the Constitution. Mr. MILLS. The Government is established on the supposition that the people will accept office; that members of the Legislature when chosen to the legislative branch will go to the islature when chosen to the legislative branch will go to the capitol and attend to their business; and that when they get there they will vote. That faith has been assured throughout our whole history. It was not done to compel men to vote, but it was done to compel men to attend the body, some of them from negligence outside, some going off to attend to private business. The compulsory power was given in the Constitution to compel men to come here and discharge their duties; and when they come here it is left to them how they will discharge their duties.

Let me give the Senate a few instances of what has been tried in this way. One of the most distinguished men who ever lived in this Government, himself a citizen of the State of Massachusetts, an ex-President of the United States, sat in the other House refused to excuse him. The House ordered him to vote. He sat still in defiance of the orders of the House and refused to cast his vote in that body; and that body gravely debated and debated, and raised committees to investigate its powers. After two days' talking they dropped the whole thing because they reached the conclusion that they had no power to compel him to vote, and never has that power been exercised in this or the other branch of Congress.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] was present in 1874 when we were members of the other House together during the great and prolonged civil-rights contest. Mr. Butler of Massachusetts great and prolonged civil-rights contest. Mr. Butler of Massachusetts and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HawLEY] were in the House at the same time. Mr. Butler pointed out Mr. Randall sitting in his seat and said, "Mr. Speaker, I point him out. There he sits. I demand that he shall vote." What was the decision of the eminent statesman who was in the chair? His decision was, "You can lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink." Never has such a rule been in force here. I say, if you have a right to compel a Senator or a Member to say, if you have a right to compel a Senator or a Member to vote you have a right to compel him to vote yea or nay. If you have the right to compel him to vote it involves the right to determine how he shall vote. If it is a power over a man and over his vote it is a power to exercise in any way the House may see proper to exercise it. I say it is a power for the use or nonuse of which he is responsible alone to his own constituency and not to this body. It is all child's play, it is all a vain effort to throw off the shoulders of the majority the responsibility which belongs to them and unload a part of it on the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of the shoulders of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders of minimum of the shoulders o longs to them and unload a part of it on the shoulders of minorities

We, sir, here on this side of the Chamber, are charged with the responsibility of legislation. The Senator from Ohio shot to the mark to-day when he told the Democrats on this side of to the mark to-day when he told the Democrats on this side of the Chamber that the responsibilities of legislation were on our shoulders. It is true. We can not escape it; we can not deceive the people about it either. It was Mr. Lincoln who said, and said most forcibly, "You may deceive a part of the people all the time, and all the people a part of the time, but you can not deceive all the people all the time." We are not going to de-ceive anybody. There is the Democratic project in the Chamber of the contract of the There is the Democratic majority in this Chamber, a Democratic majority in the other House, a Democratic President, and for the first time in thirty years the whole responsibility of the Government is on our shoulders, and we can not escape it by refining about the rules. If we have rules that do not permit a majority to enact legislation it is our duty to make rules that do permit it, and I am, for one, ready to proceed to do it. to do it

And, Mr. President, I do not belong to that other class of refiners who hold that the Constitution of the United States is emptied of any part of its power when it authorizes the House or Senate to make rules to govern its procedure, and that having once made rules it must necessarily continue under rules in accordance with those which they had already made. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land every moment of its existence, and the power to make rules is as full moment of its existence, and the power to make rules is as full and as plenary this moment as it was when the Senate was first organized. We have a right to-day to make rules to prosecute the business of this body. When our Republican friends were calling on Mr. Blaine to disregard the rules, he said repeatedly. "You have made the code of rules; I will enforce them. If you want to change them," he said, "I will not recognize any dilatory motion until I put the question to the House, whether it shall make rules to govern its procedure." That decision I beginned to be sound notwithstanding my own party was in the milieve to be sound, notwithstanding my own party was in the minority making the fight against it.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask

him a question?
Mr. MILLS. Certainly.
Mr. DANIEL. Does he think the rules as they are made are
Mr. DANIEL.

Mr. DANIEL. In other words, the majority has a right to disobey the rules and the minority has not?

Mr. MILLS. The majority have a right to make other rules they want to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the majority has the right at any time to make new rules.

Mr. MILLS. In a conflict between the rules of the Senate and the Constitution of the United States the Constitution is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. DANIEL. That is not the question I asked.

Mr. DANIEL. That is not the question I asked.
Mr. MILLS. It is easily answered.
Mr. DANIEL. But that is not the question I asked. Mr. DANIEL. But that is not the question I asked.
Mr. MILLS. What is the question?
Mr. DANIEL. Is it not constitutional for the Senate to make rules, and after those rules are made do they not bind every member separately; and does the fact that a majority wants to break them give it the right to break them after they have been adopted?

Mr. MILLS. Give them the right to unmake them and make

Mr. DANIEL. But in proceeding to unmake them must the majority proceed according to the rules as they stand before they are unmade, or is the majority a law to itself?

Mr. MILLS. The majority have the power under the Constitution to make rules every moment of its existence. Now, let me ask the Senator from Virginia a question. Does he think the Senate of the United States to day has any more power or ny less power than the Senate of the United States had when any less power than the Senate of the United States had when it first assembled before it made any rules?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly not any less.
Mr. MILLS. Then it had the right to make rules?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; I understand that this body has a right to make rules.

Mr. MILLS. If they do not bind after they are made, what is the use of making them?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question, with the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question, with the consent of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DANIEL and Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Virginia think that the Senate of the United States to-day can make a rule which will prevent the Senate for all time to come from changing that

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly not. They can change it at any time, provided the majority moves according to the rules which bind it while it is in power. What are you going to make rules for if it is not to bind the majority? Do you propose to make a rule that will bind the minority and not bind the majority, or is the rule for all equally?

Mr. HOAR. Let me put to the Senator from Texas what Mr. HOAR. Let me put to the Sonator from Texas what may seem to be an extreme case, but it is a plain illustration of the question which has been put to him. Suppose the Republican party shortly before the 4th of March, going out of power in the Senate, had enacted a rule that every bill must be read separately forty times on forty separate days, as they have a rule in the other House that a bill must be read three times on three separated days and that a pull must be read three times on three separate days, and that any amendment to that rule could only be adopted by being passed forty times on forty separate days.

Mr. MILLS. Or by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose we should the up the incoming party by a rule saying that it could not legislate for forty days? That is the answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; there is no question about that. The Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; there is no question about that. The power which the Constitution gives to the Senate and House of Representatives is a continuing power in full force every moment of its existence. I do not think there can be any sound questioning of that position. The majority can not escape the responsibility placed upon its shoulders by the people of the United States. We have got to act; we have got to pass the laws; we have got to execute the public will. The people are not going to look to the minority; they are not going to look to not going to look to the minority; they are not going to look to those ou the other side of the Chamber; they are going to look to the majority, to whom they have intrusted the power to make laws, and they will hold them responsible.

Mr. MORGAN. Where is the majority on this side of the

Mr. MILLS. If you give us a chance to vote we will show you where the majority is.

Mr. BUTLER. 1 wish to ask the Senttor from Texas a question, if he will pardon me. He says that it is the duty of the majority in all deliberative and parliamentary bodies to do business. I agree to that. If it is the duty of the Democratic majority in this body to transact business, is it not the duty of that majority to get together and see if they can not agree upon some proposition? I ask my friend that question.

Mr. MILLS. I should think it would be a very wise thing to the say and I want to say right here, as it is an open secret, that do: and I want to say right here, as it is an open secret; that when I first came here I asked my friends to do that very thing, when I have same here I asked my friends to do that very thing, but it has not been done.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator agree to that now?

Mr. MILLS. I say it is a good thing to get together.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator if he will agree to that now, and if the Democratic family meets together will he consent to and if the Democrate raining ineets begether will be consist to abide by the majority of Democrate?

Mr. MILLS. It is a very different thing, Mr. President, to abide by the majority. That is in caucus. I will agree to abide by what the majority do in this body.

by what the majority do in this body.

Mr. BUTLER. But we will bring it down to a little lower point than that, down to the family. I agree with the Senator from Texas that it is the duty of this majority to agree; and if the Senator from Texas and his friends will agree to call a family. ily meeting and to abide by the result of that, it will be settled in twenty-four hours.

Mr. MILLS. I am gratified to hear the Senator; but we are

Mr. Mills. I am gratified to hear the Senator; but we are talking here now in a sort of open Democratic caucus. I want to say that never since I have been in public life have Democratic been bound, or Republicans either, to agree upon a certain line of policy in caucus. They agree to abide by nominations. But notwithstanding all that, Mr. President, the responsibility is on us, and I take my part of it.

Mr. BUTLER. So do I.

Mr. MILLS. The responsibility is over here on our side. We can not avoid it. Now we have heard the majority denounced almost on this floor to-day, and we have heard minorities praised. We have been told that the Government was created to protect minorities alone. That is true in a great respect, but not minorities alone. The Government was created to protect all rights, and minority rights have been secured in the Constitution by interdiction so far; but wherever legislative power has been conferred upon these two Houses it has been the Constitution by interdiction so far; but wherever legislative power has been conferred upon these two Houses it has been given to majorities, not to minorities.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MILLS. Contains.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.
Mr. HILL. The Senator from South Carolina having intimated that he thought this question might probably be disposed of by a Democratic caucus, I understood him to express his willingness to abide by a Democratic caucus of the Senate. Did I ingness to ablde by a Democratic caucus of the Senate. Did I correctly understand him?

Mr. BUTLER. That is my position.

Mr. HILL. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator this, the Senate is but a portion of the law-making power of the Government, and our action requires the assent of the other House. The question I put to him is, Will he go into a caucus of the Democratic members of the House and Senate and abide by the That is my question. UTLER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Mr. MILLS. Will the Senator agree to abide by that majority?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. MILLS. A joint caucus?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; but I will say now and here, it is a little premature to ask me to cross a bridge until I get to it.
Mr. HILL. We are getting to it.
Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the Senator from New York if he will go into a Democratic caucus of this body and abide by the

Mr. HILL. I may go into it, but—
Mr. BUTLER. Answer the question, Mr. President.
Mr. HILL. Let me answer it in my own way.
Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.
Mr. HILL. I prefer to go into a caucus, where the body itself has the power to legislate. This body alone can not determine this question. Therefore, if we should take in our Democratic brethren of the other House, with the result of that caucus I would abide.

would abide.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should think the Senator—

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, we are divided on both sides, and neither side is going to yield on this question, in my opinion.

But I want to say, and I will repeat, I will be frank about that. But I want to say, and I will repeat, that the majority of this body ought to rule, and the minority ought to permit a vote to be taken on the pending bill. That,

Mr. President, is Democratic doctrine; it is the Democratic doctrine announced by the father of Democracy, the author of our party. My friends have been stating what other great statesmen have said; I want to tell the Senate what Mr. Jefferson said. I am fond of quoting him, because I know when I quote him and have his approving words, my feet are in the right path. What

The first principle is that the lex majoris par'is is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal rights; to consider the will of the society enounced by the majority of a single vote, as sacred as if unanimous, is the first of all lessons in importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learnt. This law once disregarded, no other remains but that of force, which ends necessarily in military despotism. This has been the history of the French Revolution, and I wish the understanding of our Southern brethren may be sufficiently enlarged and firm to see that their fate depends on its sacred observance.—Jefferson's Works, volume 7, page 75.

To that union of effort may our citizens ever rally, minorities falling cordially, on the decision of a question, into the ranks of the majority, and beering always in mind that a nation ceases to be republican only when the will of the majority ceases to be the law.—Jefferson w Works, volume 5,

Again, in his great inaugural address delivered in 1801, Mr. Jefferson says:

Absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority—the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism.—Jefferson's Works, volume 8, page 4.

Now, Mr. President, I have done as much talking in public life in favor of the protection of minorities as any public man. I have been resisting the invasions of individual rights and minority rights ever since I have been in public life. But I have always contended that wherever a question was left to a number of persons, the fundamental law, written or unwritten, is that the greater part of that body shall decide the question and the minor part of it shall submit.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1890, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VOORHEES (at 5 o'colock p. m.). Mr. President, I desire to pour some oil on the troubled waters this afternoon. We have had a good deal of complaint, and I do not wonder at it, about holding protracted night sessions. There has been a good deal of complaint on account of injury to health, and likewise that it is not a good time to discuss questions of great importance under the gaslights. I listened with marked attention and interest to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] on the appeal which he made for time to debate these questions in the hours of the day instead of the hours of the night.

With a view, Mr. President, to give full time for discussion, for I am the friend of free debate, and at the same time to relieve for I am the friend of free debute, and at the same time to relieve the strain upon physical endurance, I move that the Senate at 6 o'clock this evening take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10. I trust there will be no objection to so reasonable and proper a disposition of our time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have the motion stated.
Mr. VOORHEES. I will state it, with the permission of the Chair. I move that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow, so that we may sleep in our beds and at the same time have ample time in the hours of the day to go on with this discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to raise a point of order. It is now 5 o'clock.

Oclock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. However, the Chair will hear the inquiry of the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I raise a point of order. It is now 5 o'clock, and the motion is for a recess to take effect at 6 o'clock. I contend that a motion of that kind, postponing the hour of retiring from the Chamber, is a debatable motion. It is not an adjournment, it is not a motion to take a recess now, but it is a motion

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am only seeking to suggest it. I hope my friend from West Virginia is not in so great a hurry that he will prevent me from stating it in such orderly fashion as shall occur

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Sentor from Colorado; but the motion of the Senator from Indiana is not debutable

Mr. WOLCOTT. The point of order I was proceeding to state to the Senate is that this is a motion that at a certain hour in the future we shall take a recess until some hour to-mor ow, and that under the definition laid down in Rule XXII such a motion is not in order. At 6 o'clock a motion that we then take a recess would be in order, but it is not in order at this time to move that at some future hour we shall take a recess

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Chair hold that the motion is amendable?

Mr. STEWART. It certainly is.
Mr. VOORHEES. I understand that it is no more amendable than a motion to adjourn.

Mr. TELLER. Why not?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that the motion is amendable. He would be very glad to have a suggestion from the Senator from M. ssachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on that point.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. KEM. In order that the House may understand me, I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk a marked article from the Omaha Daily Bee of date October 13, 1893.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will read the article referred to.

Washington Bureau of the Bee, 513 Fourteenth Street, Washington, October 12, Washington, October 12, At last justice comes to a lot of settlers in northern Nebruska. By the act of March 2, 18:9, the great Sloux Indian Reservation in South Dakota and Nebruska was opened to settlement under the provisions of the homestead law in force at that time, which required residence on the land for the period of five years in order to require title, unless the settler wanted to pay the sum of $1.25 per acre, in which case he would get title in six months. The act of March 3, 1891, amended the original act of 1883 so as to require a residence of only fourteen months in order to gain title. A provision of this last act, however, made it apply only to that portion of the reservation which is situated in South Dakota, leaving the old to apply to that situated in Nebraska.

This discriminated very seriously against the Nebraska settler, for in order that he might acquire a title to his land he must reside on the tract settled upon by him five years, while his neighbor just across the line in South Dakota could acquire the title in fourteen months.

DID NOT PROTECT NEBRASKANS.

At the time this amended act passed Congress the Nebraska delegation, consisting of Messrs Bryan, McKERGHAN, and KEM, raised no objection. Strange to say, a bill so seriously affecting and discriminating against a large number of Nebraskans, and especially those in Boyd County, was allowed to pass without a single protest on the part of the delegation. During the session of the Flity-second Congress the attention of Senator Man. Debrow was called to this condition of things by very earnest and serious protests from Nebraskans directly interested, and he introduced and serious protests from Nebraskans directly interested, and he introduced and serious protests from Nebraskans of the Senate was sent to the House and was allowed to sleep the sleep of death, no member of the Nebraska delegation manifesting sufficient interest therein to secure its consideration. There never has been any opposition to the bill. The Nebraska Republican members of the present House, who had their attention called to this condition by petitions, memorials, etc., without number, held a consultation and decided upon a well directed plan insuring its passage and relieving these settlers.

Accordingly this morning Mr. Meikled low, of the Committee on Public Lands, called up the matter, and he are moments the delegation succeeded in passing through the House the bill which might have been passed two years ago had the delegation then in Congress acted with energy and good judgment.

It may be of interest to the settlers affected to know that neither Bryan.

yeirs ago had the delegator then at course affected to know that neither BRYAN, It may be of interest to the settlers affected to know that neither BRYAN, MCKEIGHAN nor KEM were present, nor in any manner aided in the passage of the bill this morning. The bill now goes to the Senate, and Senator MANDERSON will secure its passage there.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to this article, for the reason that it is a gross misrepresentation of the attitude of that part of the Nebruska delegation referred to in the article toward their constituents in Nebruska, referred to in the article toward their constituents in Nebraska, and seems to be a continuance of the guerrilla warfare which has been waged against mysel by certain Nebraska Republicans ever since I have been a member of this body.

It is plain to be seen by those who have heard the article read, that it was the intent of the writer of the same to convey the idea to the readers of that article that the gentlemen so referred to have wilfully neglected their duty towards their constituents. have wilfully neglected their duty towards their constituents.

stand here to-day. Mr. Speaker, as an humble member of this body, to denounce the article as absolutely false in every respect.

What are the facts relative to this mutter? I hope the House will indulge me for a short time while I relate, as briefly as possible, what the facts are. We find here that the writer, in his zeal to vilify and misrepresent the attitude of this humble member and his honorable colleagues on this floor, has overreached himself, for he says:

At the time this amended act passed Congress the Nebraska delegation, consisting of Messrs. BRYAN, MCKEIGHAN, and KEM, raised no objection.

Now, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, that when that act was passed it was next to the last day of the Fifty-first Congress, and neither Mr. BRYAN, Mr. McKeighan, nor myself were members of that Congress. The writer of this article holds out the idea, and lays stress on the fact, that these gentlemen failed to do their duty in not keeping down that proposition when it discriminated against settlers on that part of the reservation in Nebraska. I say, sir, if anybody is to blame for this it is the honorable gentlemen who preceded us as mem-bers of this House from Nebraska, namely, Mr. Dorsey, Mr. Connell, and Mr. Laws, the Republican delegation that represented Nebraska at that time.

I further state in the presence of the House that I, at no time, have neglected to perform any duties incumbent upon me in looking after these interests, either in the Fifty-second Con-gress or in the present session of this Congress. The writer would have us believe that the Republican Representatives from Nebraska on this floor, by concerted action or by an under-standing, have taken such action that passed that bill through this House on the 12th day of this month.

this House on the 12th day of this month.

I deny that proposition, and say that the bill would have passed the House if Mr. Meiklejohn had been dead as Julius Cæsar.

Now, what are the facts? Sometime in the early part of the Fifty-second Congress I introduced a bill covering exactly the same ground. After this I learned that Senator Manderson had introduced a like bill in the Senate, and had succeeded in passing it; but when I learned of this fact it was sometime after the bill had presed the Senate. the bill had passed the Senate. At once upon learning of this, I looked up Mr. MANDERSON'S bill and found that it had been referred to the wrong committee. I think the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], perhaps remembers the circumstances.

When I went to him, I learned that the bill had been referred to a subcommittee; but the chairman of that subcommittee had gone home, and there could be nothing done about the rereference until he returned. It was almost a month before he came back. As soon as he returned, I took action that led to the reference of the bill to the proper committee, of which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] is chairman. I went before that committee and had a hearing, and the bill was reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Amerman]. I myself wrote the report and he submitted it. Owing to these unfortunate delays the bill was delayed till we were drawing toward the close of the session of Congress, and everyone who knows anything about the situation here at such times knows how difficult it is to get a hearing upon a matter which is far down on the Calendar, and can not be reached in its regular order.

That was the condition of this bill, and the only way that there could be a hearing had on it at all was by unanimous con-sent. I state now that I tried for six long weeks to get a hearing on that bill by unanimous consent, but because of the many who were endeavoring to get hearings under similar circumstances, it was impossible for the Speaker to recognize me.

Now, this is the plain history of the bill in the last Congress.

Upon the second bill day of this session I introduced the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, where I followed it and had a hearing upon it. It was ordered reported by Mr. Hare. He reported it, submitting the report that I had written in the previous Congress, and the bill was placed upon the Calendar.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I was confined to my room by sickness and was unable to reach the House, but on the 12th day of this month I felt a little better and came to the House to see whether Mr. HARE had reported the bill. The chairman of the committee had informed me that as soon as it was reported it would be called up and disposed of.

What was my surprise when I entered this Hall, and upon meeting the chairman [Mr. McRAE], was informed that my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. Meiklejohn] had called up the bill and it had passed by unanimous consent.

Now, gentlemen, this is simply a plain statement of the history of the bill up to this time. I said nothing about Mr. Metteljohn's action, which, in my estimation, was action that does not become a gentleman of highmindedness. I said nothing about it at the time, but awaited developments; and now follows this report in the Omaha Bee, made by the reporter who is doing the work here for that paper, which report is totally false in every respect. I have been accused by my political enemies and have been held up to my constituents as having neglected and failed to do my duty in this respect.

Now, we see the animus of the whole matter very plainly. Mr. MEIKLEJOHN goes out of his own territory to hunt up business that does not belong to him; then comes this article in the Bee, stating that the Republican members from Nebraska are entitled to all the honor of passing this bill, when the facts show that the work had all been done; that the bill had been reported fa-vorably by the committee, and that the only thing necessary was for somebody to rise in his place and ask unanimous consent to have the bill passed.

I make this explanation, Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself, in justice to the people I represent, and in justice to my honorable colleagues [Mr. BRYAN and Mr. McKeighan].

The article savs further:

It may be of interest to settlers affected to know that neither Mr. BRYAN, r. McKeighan, nor Mr. Kem were present, nor in any manner aided in the passage of the bill this morning.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I was confined to my room with illness. The fact is that for six weeks I have not been well enough to attend the sessions of this House, and if I had done myself justice I would not have been here any of that time, but have been here the most of the time, but only by coming when I felt very unwell. As I have said, on entering the Hall on the 12th of this month, to see if the bill had yet been reported. I found that Mr. MEIKLEJOHN had been previous enough in his action to call the bill up without warrant and without any good reason, for I should have called it up next day, and if I had not been able to have been here, the chairman of the committee would have done it, as he has informed me.

Mr. RAY. May I interrupt the gentleman?
Mr. KEM. Not now. I will say in exoneration of my honorable colleagues [Mr. BRYAN and Mr. MCKEIGHAN] that upon that day Mr. McKeighan was dangerously ill in his bed, under the care of a physician. I will say further in this connection that it was a matter in which neither Mr. BRYAN nor Mr. Mc. KEIGHAN were personally interested and they were too highminded to interfere in a matter relating to my district without consulting me, as did the gentleman, Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. a matter wholly belonging to me; it was a local matter in my own district, the care of which I was alone responsible for; and I Speaker, that the action of Mr. MEIKLEJOHN, in my estimation, was not that of a high minded gentleman toward his colleague in this matter.

This, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, is my explanation of the BOUNTY LANDS AND PENSIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON (when the Committee on the Judiciary was reached). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3130) to repeal in part and to limit sections 3480 and 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3130) to repeal in part and to limit sections 3480 and 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4716 and 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, so far, and no further, modified and repealed as to dispense with proof of loyalty during the late war of the rebellion as a prerequisite to being restored or admitted to the pension roll of any person who otherwise would be entitled thereto under existing laws; nor shall proof of loyalty be necessary in any application for bounty land where the proof otherwise shows that the applicant is entitled thereto: Provided. That no soldier restored or admitted to the pension roll under this act shall receive any back pay: And provided further, That this act shall not extend to or embrace any person under the disability imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker if no one desires an explanation

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, if no one desires an explanation of the bill, I do not care to take up any time to explain it.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will make some explanation of this bill. I see that it absolutely repeals one section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. OATES. No. Mr. BURROWS. Well, the gentleman says no; but it takes out of the section all that is vital in it. Section 4716 provides—

That no money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased persons, who in any manner roluntarily engaged in or aided and abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

And the gentleman proposes to modify that section by adding a proviso—for it amounts to that—providing that no applicant for a pension shall be required to prove loyalty. That absolutely nullifies that section and wipes it from the statute book, if it

The gentleman is mistaken. It does not. It Mr. OATES. The gentleman is mistaken. It does not. It only dispenses with proof of loyalty as to those who were upon the pension rolls before the war and were dropped from it in consequence of that war, which was the case as to those who lived within the States in so-called rebellion. That is the limitation in the bill and consequently it does not prove the conseq tation in the bill, and consequently it does not propose to repeal the section at all. The section may properly be applied to some other cases still. I will state for the information of the House that last Congress, being the second one in which this bill had been favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, we sent a copy of it with an inquiry to the Secretary of the Interior, and he also referred it to the Commissioner of Pensions, for rior, and he also referred to the Commissioner of Pensions, for information with respect to its effect if it were passed. They stated that the number of pensioners who had been dropped and who were still in life and not restored was exceedingly small.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman please explain what classes this amendment refers to?

Mr. OATES. I had just done so; but I will do it again. Mr. DINGLEY. And the probable number.

Mr. OATES. Those who were upon the pension rolls for service rendered in some war and who lived in the seceding States when the war came on were all dropped from the rolls. All those who have been able to prove affirmative acts of loyalty since have been restored, and those who were not able to prove affirmative acts of loyalty were not restored. For instance, if one of them had a son or relative in the army of the Confederate States, if he had any sympathy for them, he could not prove affirmative acts of loyalty. I suppose there were scarcely one of them who served in the army of the Confederate States. They were too old.

I do not recollect the number given, in response to that refrence to the Department, but it was an insignificant number. So Gen. Raum and Secretary Noble both approved the bill and recommended its passage, or did not object to it. Now, the more important feature of the bill is this. There are a number in the South still who had served in the Mexican war, or some of the Indian wars, and for such service Congress had granted them bounty land. Those who had not obtained that bounty land when the war came on were cut off from it. Some of them have succeeded since the war. But although there are very few, indeed, some have not obtained the bounty lands they were entitled to, because these sections require proof of affirmative acts of loyalty; such, as if performed, in many localities in the Southern States during the war, it would have resulted in their being incarcerated in jail in all probability.

Now, wherever those grants of land were made, they were made for services already rendered, and the parties to whom they were made had a right to them. There is nothing in the law which forfeits that right. Furthermore, it has been decided by which forests that right. Furthermore, it has been decided by the Supreme Court in sundry cases, the Armstrong case, the Pigaud case, and two or three others, that after the war, even as to those who participated in the rebellion, if not within the fourteenth article of amendment, they were relieved by the President's proclamations of amnesty and pardon, so that it was not necessary for them in any court to prove acts of loyalty even though the law required it. For instance, the law with reference to captured and abandoned property provided that all property which was left by citizens fleeing before the Union Army, or captured in the course of the progress of the Army, should be taken possession of by agents of the Government and sold, and the net proceeds covered into the Treasury, and that at any time within two years after the close of hostilities such property, or the net proceeds of sale might be reclaimed by loyal citizens by action in the Court of Claims. The question was brought up in that way, and the Supreme Court decided that persons who were covered by the President's proclamations of amnesty and pardon did not have to prove loyalty at all. And even when the Congress, by way of a proviso to an appropriation bill, enacted that in proceedings in the Court of Claims, whenever a man pleaded his pardon under the President's proclamation his suitshould be dismissed, the Supreme Court decided that that proviso was a nullity, that the President's proclamations, which the Constitution expressly gave him a right to make, could not be overturned in that way, and that the President's proclamations absolved all those who were covered by them from the obligation of making any such proof of loyalty.

Now, with reference to these men who had served the Government in the war with Mexico or in Indian wars, Congress saw fit to vote them bounty lands, and they were entitled to those lands, and now these sections have no practical operation except that they are retained in the Departments as rules of evidence, when in fact they are not legally so. All that this bill proposes is to dispense with proof of loyalty in respect to those men who had earned, as Congress declared, these bounty lands, and who are now in a condition where they can not make the proof which is required by the Departments under these absurd exertions although in the courts they would not be received to sections, although in the courts they would not be required to make such proof at all.

So that you here, by denying these men the benefit of this log-islation, subject them to the requirement of making this proof, which is when those sections have been practically overturned and declared null by the highest court in the land. should this bill be objected to? It seems to me that there is no good objection to it, and I think that the Secretary and Gen. Raum took the right view of it. Gen. Raum made a calculation as to how much it would amount to. The bounty land feature amounts to a good deal more than the other; the other is a good deal more than the other is a good deal more th exceedingly small, and at this time provides for very few, if any.

For the information of the House, I will ask that the report be read. I think it states the amount.

Mr. PICKLER. Is the report unanimous?
Mr. OATES. It is.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before the report is read I wish to ask the gentleman a question. If this bill passes, it will allow a number of claimants to locate their scrip upon the public

Mr. OATES. Yes; upon lands subject to homestead entry.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Anywhere?
Mr. OATES. Anywhere that the Government has such lands.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Some years ago any kind of scrip that could be located upon the public lands commanded a very high premium, I think at times as high as $50 or $60 an acre. Mr. OATES. I never heard of that. In my country it has generally sold for about a dollar per acre.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Anything that could be located upon the public lands generally commanded at one time a very high premium, and I am under the impression that it still does. Mr. OATES. None of these cases are for more than a hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Precisely; but scrip for 160 acres would be worth, perhaps, three or four thousand dollars. Now would that be equitable? Would it not be better to commute these claims.

Mr. OATES. I have never heard of the scrip selling for any such price as the gentleman suggests. I never heard of it sell ing for more than a dollar and a half or two dollars an acre, and I have no idea that it would sell for any such sum as the gentle-man has mentioned. The truth is that in a great many of the States there is no land on which scrip could be located.

Mr. BURROWS. How much of the public lands will this bill

Mr. OATES. I do not remember precisely. I have asked that the report be read, which will probably give the informa-

Mr. BURROWS. The report does not state.

Mr. OATES. It does not?

Mr. BURROWS. No. How much of the public lands will be required under this bill?

Mr. OATES. I do not recollect the number of acres.
Mr. BURROWS. How many persons who were stricken from the pension roll for their supposed disloyalty to the Government will be put back on the roll by this proposed legislation?
Mr. OATES. According to my understanding, not exceeding one hundred. Perhaps not one-fourth that number.

Mr. BURROWS. Has the gentleman any positive knowledge on that question?
Mr. OATES. The Pension Office has better information on the subject than anybody else.

Now, let me ask the gentleman whether

Mr. BURROWS. Now, let me ask the gentleman whether the Department, in the report to which he has alluded, did not report against the proposition to allow these land warrants to be located

Mr. OATES. The Department reported in favor of it. I presented that report with the report of the committee in the last Congress, and the bill thereupon was passed. I thought it was printed with the report.

Mr. BURROWS. I had understood that the Department reported against that portion of the bill which related to the location of land warrants.

Mr. OATES. No, sir; the report was favorable; that is my distinct recollection. Furthermore, I will say that if this bill passes I will move a reconsideration if it can be shown that there has been a report against the proposition. I do not want anything but what is fair and right. I do not want anybody to be misled by any statement of mine.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama is through I desire to be heard a moment.

Mr. OATES. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BURROWS. I can not tell. I will need some little time. ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to know from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] what time he yields to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Burrows]. This matter is in the morning

Mr. BURROWS. Then I will take the floor when the gentleman is through Mr. CULBERSON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Alab ma should yield to the gentleman from Michigan, but I would like to know what time is to be occupied by the gentlem in from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. I can not tell; I suppose ten or fifteen minutes will be all I shall need.

Mr. OATES. I yield the gentleman not exceeding ten minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes a modification of a certain section of the Revised Statutes which has not been read and which I propose to read. Section 3480 of the Revised Statutes which the policy of Statutes which the statute of Statutes of Statutes which the statute of Statutes of Statutes of Statutes which the statutes of Statu the Revised Statutes, which the bill proposes to "modify," is in the following language:

It shall be unlawful for any officer to pay any account, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, 1861—

The time legally determined as the commencement of the re-

in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression; and no pardon hereiofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this section is modified or repealed.

This may touch the question of pardon to which the gentleman from Alabama has referred.

Mr. OATES. The Supreme Court has already decided that pardon dispenses with all proof of loyalty.

Mr. BURROWS. The section continues:

But this section shall not be construed to probabit the payment of claims founded upon contracts made by any of the Departments, where such claims were assigned or contracted to be assigned prior to the lat day of April, 1861, to the creditors of such contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to the ist day of March, 1861.

Now, the bill before the House proposes to modify that section in so far as to allow land warrants to be located without proof of loyalty on the part of the claimant—to allow persons who were disloyal to locate their land warrants upon the public lands; and the "trifling modification" proposed to be made in this section is simply adding this proviso:

Provided. That in all applications for bounty lands the applicant shall not be required to make proof of loyalty.

That is the scope of the bill so far as this section is concerned. The other section which, adopting the language of the bill, it is proposed to "modify," is as follows:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

That is to be modified by adding in substance-

Provided. That no proof of loyalty shall be required to restore a pensioner to the pension roll.

This bill, if enacted into law, wholly repeals this statute. Instead of calling this a "modification" of the statute—
Mr. OATES. This does not affect the payment of any money claims.

Mr. BURROWS. That is the other section. I am reading this last section—the proposed modification in regard to pensions. The bill simply wipes out the provisions of the existing law and puts upon the pension roll, without regard to loyalty, everyone who was on the pension rolls prior to 1861, without requiring proof of loyalty from any person making application for a pension.

Mr. OATES. It applies only to those who were on the pension roll and were dropped.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not say that. It says "no money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person—
Mr. OATES. But the bill does say it.
Mr. BURROWS. I think not. The bill says "restored or admitted to;" so that a person who served in the Mexican war or any of the wars prior to 1861 could apply for a pension now, and, under the "modification" which the gentleman proposes, could be put on the pension roll, notwithstanding the fact that he may have served four years against the Government.

Now, we have been very liberal in this matter of pension
We have already relieved by repeated measures those engine in the Mexican war and restored them to the pension roll, although they were hostile to the Government during the war. I therefore insist, sir, we ought not to go to the extent proposed in this measure and wipe this provision wholly from the statute books of the country.

The gentleman in his report accompanying the bill I see uses

this language

Mr. OATES (interrupting). Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan if it is not the law now that all those who served in the Mexican war get pensions

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know to what extent that law went.

Mr. OATES (continuing). Without proof of loyalty being required?

Mr. BURROWS. If that be true, then what do you want this

Mr. OATES. That bill to which I referred related to pensions and bounty lands to those who served in the Mexic in war. But there is another class of cases not embraced, those who erved in the Indian wars and were once pensioned, but were dropped from the rolls at the time of the war. There is no provision for their relief in the Mexican war pension bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I have neither the time nor the disposition to prolong the debate. I simply enter my protest against this proposition. I know we are powerless, we are test against this proposition. I know we are powerless, we are helpless, and that a majority of the House can destroy these statutes if they desire, but it shall not be consummated without my protest. But I submit it is a most inopportune time to propose to restore to the pension rolls the names of persons who were disloyal to the Government, with one hand, while with the other this Administration is striking from the pension rolls by the thousands the men who defended the country in the hour of its peril. [Applause on the Republican side.] Call the hounds of the track of the Union soldier before attempting to restore to the pension roll the men who were disloyal to the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, sir, I was proceeding to say that I notice in the report of the gentleman he uses this language:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration H. R. 4548, find that the bill is intended to suspend the operation of sections 389 and 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in two classes of cases only. Soon after the war between the States—usually called the war of the rebellion—began, the names of all persons resident in the seceding States who were receiving pensions were dropped from the pension roll on account of their supposed disloyalty, as they were citizens and residents of territory over which the so-called rebellion extended.

"So-called rebellion," and "the war between the States. would not notice this uncalled-for declaration in this report were it not to vindicate the truth of history. There never was a "war between the States' except in the minds of those who believed in the doctrine of State sovereignty and who would exalt the State above the nation. The civil war, of 1861 was a war in which the Government of the United States was engaged on the one side and citizens in armed rebellion against its rightful authority on the other. These were the contending forces and not the "States."

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose simply to enter my protest, as I stated before, against this legislation, not because I expect it will be of any avail, but that this country may know whither we are drifting. I expect these statutes will be wiped from the statute books. I expect the majority of the House will declare the "so called rebellion" to have been a "war between the States," reasserting the old doctrine of State sovereignty, and that you will, while approving of the policy of this Administration in driving Union men from the pension rolls without a hearing and without mercy, restore to that roll of honor all those who were untrue to the Government in the hour of its supremest oril. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I want to say but a word or two in reply to what the gentleman from Michigan has said. He has taken a very wide range in his remarks, and has made an assault upon the Pension Office because of a provision of this bill with reference to the res oration to the pension rolls of a very insignificant number, a dozen or two, of pensioners who were dropped from the rolls without their fault just before the war. The Secretary of the Interior of the gentleman's own party, the last Republican Secretary, and the last Republican Commissioner of Pensions both recommended after a full examination of the of Pensions both recommended, after a full examination of the bill, that it should be passed. That shows how little the gentleman's objection or criticisms have to rest upon.

There is nothing partisan in the bill. It is an act of simple justice to keep the rules which prevail in the Department, which are of no use except as statutes of limitation against conjured up claims against the Government. This does not repeal but susclaims against the Government. This does not repeal but suspends them, so as to prevent their being extended to these meritorious claims. A mu who served the Government and has a claim against the Government which Congress before the war claim against the Government which Congress before the war recognized, and granted him a bounty-lind warrant, ought cer-tainly to have the benefit of it. It was a vested right before there was any war between the Southern States and the Union.

Now, there is nothing in this provision of law but what will commend itself to the sense of right and justice of anyone who will consider it fairly. The right in these parties had vested; that is to say, while it was a vested right the land to which the parties were entitled had not been located. It are nothing in respect to that clause of the bill with reference to the restoration to the pension rolls, for it amounts to nothing, as stated by Gen. Raum, the number being very insignific int. The truth is, that those who served in the Mexican war have already got their pensions. 1 presume those who are living and those who served in that war doubtless obtained bounty-land warrants too. But those who were entitled to bounty l.nds and can not make proof of their loyalty should be entitled to receive the benefits of the law, and that is the class of claims that is sought to be reached by this bill.

These were not confiscated. A great many of the men who were entitled to them had nothing to do with the Confederate war; and even if they had, what difference does it make before the courts of the country?

The highest court in the land has declared that if a man who participated in the war was covered by the President's proclumation of amnesty, he had nothing more to prove than the facts which constitute his claim. Here I am on this floor, about as bad a rebel as ever served in the Confederate army, having fought in twenty-seven battles for my honest convictions. I have the right under the law to come here and act as a Representative, and am as devoted a friend to the Union and this Government now, and I would stand by it, and I venture to say in the case of war I would shed qu te as much blood for it as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Burrows], and more than he ever did shed for the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I move the for the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I move the previous question.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OATES. I will.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some mis-apprehension about this bill and its effects. It is an old bill, which has been introduced into Congress in quite a number of

I think it had its origin long before the passage of the bill allowing pensions to all Mexican veterans. Now, the fact about it is that about seventy old soldiers, who served in the Mexican war, were dropped from the rolls on account of their participation in the rebellion.

This bill was originally intended to replace those men on the ension rolls, notwithstanding the section which is involved in this controversy

Now, since that took place, all the soldiers of the Mexican war, including those dropped from the pension rolls, have been placed upon the pension rolls as they arrived at the age of 62 years, we all know. Therefore the proposition in this bill in relation to pensions amounts simply to nothing whatever. It will not place any disloyal man upon the pension roll who is not allowed to go there now, by a bill which I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Burrows] voted for, the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. BURROWS. I did. I voted for it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, as to the next proposition, it is simply this, that those surviving soldiers of the Mexican war who are entitled to a bounty of 160 acres of land, and who had not before the war received the land, who had participated in the rebellion against the Government of the United States, may now come forward and receive the bounty to which they were entitled as soldiers of the Mexican war.

I beg to suggest that in my opinion there are not a dozen men in the United States, survivors of the Mexican war, who were entitled to bounty lands, who have not already received them, for it is a notorious fact that when the war with Mexico closed, the soldiers in the main sold and transferred their rights to bounty lands upon the final pay rolls of the Army; and if you go to the Department containing the records of that war, you will find that hundreds and thousands of these soldiers, at the time they left the Army and received their pay, transferred their right to bounty lands to some persons who paid them for it. Now, I have been in Congress quite a number of terms—eight-

I have lived in a country that furnished a great many soldiers to the Mexican war. Yet since my time here I have only found one soldier who failed to transfer or sell his right to this bounty long before the war of the rebellion.

I do not think there is any real reason for this bill. Certainly there is no reason why the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Bur-ROWS] should make it the basis of a war cry against the Democratic side of the House. Certainly all these men have been penwould be entitled to beauty-land warrants under the measure.

Mr. BURROWS. May I inquire of the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. Culberson] if this bill in no way modifies the question of the right of the claimant to a place on the pension rolls, possibly the gentleman would modify the bill as to strike that out.

Mr. CULBERSON. If I had charge of the bill, I would do it

Mr. BURROWS. Possibly the gentleman from Alabama [Mr.

OATES] will strike that out.

Mr. OATES. It is so small—

Mr. BURROWS. The smaller it is the easier it can be stricken out.

Mr. OATES. And since the soldiers of the Indian war are

Mr. OATES. And since the soldiers of the Indian war are being placed upon the pension rolls—
Mr. CULBERSON. If the gentleman will permit—I hope I am not trespassing—I would call the attention of the gentlem in from Michigan [Mr. Burrows] to the reason why this bill should pass, so far as it relates to bounty lands. There are only a few of these men left. We have, by the section which has been referred to, a rule of procedure, and evidence in that r spect in the Departments of the Government which the Su, reme Court has decided to be uncoexitational and up not has decided to be unconstitutional and unjust.

They have decided it in the Pendleton case in 9 Wallace, the Klien case in 13 Wallace, the Armstrong case in 13 Wallace; that since the President's proclamation of general amnesty, that the disability of disloyalty no longer existed, and suitors in the courts are not required to prove loyalty as a jurisdictional fact.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have no objection to it, as far as the bounty land is concerned.

Mr. OATES. I want to say in reply to what the gentleman has said about scrip, that he is probably misled by another class of scrip, granted to some of the Indian tribes a few years ago, of scrip, grated to some of the indian tribes a few years ago, which were locatable upon any character of land, on mineral as well as agricultural lands. These are locatable only upon agricultural lands, and they are never of a high price.

Mr. TURNER. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

The gentleman from Texas has just suggested that all the survivo: s of the Mexican war suspended from pensions by the operation of the section of the Revised Statutes to which the gentleman refers have been restored by the Mexican pension act.

Mr. CULBERSON. They have.

Mr. OATES. I stated that awhile ago; that it required no proof of loyalty.

Mr. TURNER. I want to suggest, further, what my friend may have overlooked for a moment, that while that section of the Revised Statutes did apply to suspended pensioners who claimed pensions on account of disabilities incurred in the Indian wars, and to surviving soldiers of the Indian wars, that the Indian pension act restored them. So that there are really no pensioners to be affected by this bill.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman from Georgia had anticipated me a little, because I was going to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I am perfectly willing, because there are a very small number affected by it, to strike out the provision referring to pensions, so as to let the bill apply to those who have gained bounty lands by their services to the Government.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman proposes to modify the bill by striking out that part to which have referred, and I desire to say in this connection that this matter was brought up unexpectedly to me this morning, when I had a number of letters on my desk from Union soldiers who had just been stricken from the rolls; and I did feel a little indignant, and do feel a little indignant, that the men who fought for the country should be stricken from the rolls in the face of a proposition to restore men to the pension rolls for cer

Ince of a proposition to restore men to the pension rolls for certain reasons, and I think they had better wait until after this onslaught on the Union soldiers shall cease.

Mr. OATES. I say to the gentleman from Michigan that he is no better friend, and is not discosed to do any more, which is truly merited, for the Union soldiers than I. [Applause.]

Mr. BURROWS. I have always found the gentleman very

Mr. OATES. And if there has been anything wrong done in the Pension Office, I am satisfied when it is brought to the attention of the proper authorities that it will be corrected. I do not know that any injustice has been done.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the gentleman proposes to modify his bill, and I will accept a modification of it.

The SPEAKER. From examination of the bill, it would appear that it would require to be almost remodeled.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in each Congress for several years I have introduced a bill similar to the measure now being considered, and notwithstanding my interest in the subject, I have refrained from participating in this debate, as the proposed legislation seems so just that I could not assume that any members in this body would interpose objections to its enactment, but while the amendment is being prepared I will say actment, but while the amendment is being prepared I will say that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Burrows] is clearly in error in the supposition that these limitations are demanded by the best soldier element. I will say further, in defense of and in commendation of Federal soldiers, that within the limit of my experience the brave men who entered the Union army in 1861 and fought foremost in the great battles until the war closed in 1865, are not asking for these restrictions, but from the bravest and most distinguished generals down to the youngest private, they are not only willing but anylous that every statute of this they are not only willing, but anxious that every statute of this character shall be repealed, and that every existing restriction shall be removed from those against whom they fought. [Ap-

Mr. CULBERSON. Let us have a vote. Mr. OATES. I now send up the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words, commencing with the words "to being," in line 7, and reading as follows:

"To being restored or admitted to the pension roll of any person who otherwise would be entitled thereto under existing laws; nor shall proof of loyalty be necessary."

Also the following words in line 7:

"Provided. That no soldier restored or admitted to the pension roll under this act shall receive any back pay: And provided further, That this act shall not extend to or embrace any person under the disability imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal in part and to limit sections 3480 and 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4716 and 3480 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed so far and no further modified in the bill as to dispense with the proof of loyalty during the late war of the rebellion as a prerequisite in any application for bounty land where the proof otherwise shows that the applicant is entitled thereto.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I did not listen to and can not understand exactly the amendment or the bill as reported after amendment. Does that eliminate from the bill everything in regard to section 4716?

Mr. OATES. It takes out everything about restoring the soldiers to the pension roll, and now relates only to bounty lands.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask to have the bill read again?

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask to have the bill read again?
The bill as amended was again read.
Mr. BURROWS. Why does not the gentleman strike out all in regard to section 4716?
Mr. OATES. It distinctly says that the sections are so modified only in respect to those applications for bounty lands.
Mr. BURROWS. But section 4716 does not relate to bounty land at all.

Mr. OATES. It is a rule of evidence retained in the Departments, and they might construct as being extended. If it does not have any effect on land bountles it will not hurt.

Mr. BURROWS. Is section 4716 used as a rule of evidence in determining questions as to bounty lands?

Mr. OATES. It is used as a rule of evidence in the Departments; I do not know how far they extend it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The section is expressly restricted to applications for pensions.

Mr. OATES. Well, I am unable to account for the construction that they put upon it in the Departments.

Mr. BURROWS. Will not the gentleman consent to strike dion that they put.

Mr. BURROWS. Will not the Mr. BURROWS. Will not the out all mention of that section?

OATES. Read the section.

The section process.

Mr. BURROWS. The section provides that-

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or helrs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. OATES. I have no objection to that section being struck

Mr. BURROWS. Then let that be struck out and the words that are applicable to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as it will then

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3480 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, so far, and no further, modified and repealed as to dispense with proof of loyalty during the late war of the rebellion as a prerequisite in any application for bounty land where the proof otherwise shows that the applicant is entitled thereto.

Mr. BURROWS. That will make it all right.

The bill as modified was passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid

The latter motion was agreed to.
The title was amended so as to conform to the modification of

UNITED STATES COURTS, IDAHO AND WYOMING.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892; and I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide the mes and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States (Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, be amended to read as fol-of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, be amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 6. That the terms of the district court for the district of the State of Idaho shall be held at the town of Moscow, beginning on the second Monday in May and the second Monday in October in each year; at Boise City, beginning on the first Monday in December: at the city of Blackfoot, beginning on the first Monday in March and the second Monday in September in each year; and the provision of statute now existing for the holding of said courts on any day contrary to the provisions of this act is hereby repealed; and all suits, prosecutions, proce-s, recognizances, bail bonds, and other things pending in or re-urnable to said court are hereby transferred to, and shall be made returnable to, and have for in the said respective terms in this act provided in the same manner and with the same effect as they would have had had said existing statute not been passed."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. BRODERICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MATERIALS AND LABOR FOR PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 86) for the protection of persons furnishing materials and labor for the construction of public works; and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter any person or persons entering into a formal contract with the United States for the construction of any public building, or the prosecution and completion of any public work, or for extensive repairs upon any public building or public work, shall be required before commencing such work to execute the usual penal bond, with good and sufficient sureties, with the additional obligations that such contractor contractors shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying him or them labor and materials in the prosecution of the work provided for in such contract: and any person or persons making application therefor, and furnishing affidavit to the Department under the direction of which said work is being or has been prosecuted, that labor or materials for the prosecution of such work has been supplied by him or them, and payment for which has not been made, shall be furnished with a certified copy of said contract and bond, upon which said person or persons supplying such labor and materials shall have a right of action, and shall be authorized to bring suit in the name of the United States against said contractor and sureties and to prosecute the same to final judgment and execution: Provided, That such action and its prosecution shall involve the United States in no expense:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CLERKS AND MARSHALS' FEES, ETC.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3963) to amend sections 828, 833, 847, and 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to clerks' fees, semiannual returns of fees by district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, commissioners' fees, and to offenders against the United States.

NATIONAL BANKS.

I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 2344) for the better control and to protect the safety of national banks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MEIKLEJOHN].

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I thank the gentleman from Illinois

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for the courtesy extended.

Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago my colleague [Mr. KEM] had read from the desk an extract from a paper purporting to be the Omaha Bee relative to the passage of the Sioux Indian Reservation bill, and which served him as the basis of some astonishing observations permitted under the license of personal privilege. I desire to state to my colleague and the House that I am neither the president editor was represented by the terroricator editor. I desire to state to my colleague and the House that I am neither the proprietor, editor, nor reporter of that paper. On the 12th of this month, after the morning hour, I asked of the House unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, which provides that the same conditions which apply to that portion of the Sioux Reservation in South Dakota shall apply to the portion in Nebraska. The measure was of special interest to the people of my State.

Before calling that measure up I sought my colleague, but found him absent from the House. As a member of the Committee on Public Lands, it was certainly my privilege to call up the measure, especially in view of the fact that many citizens of our State are deeply interested in this legislation. Through the courtesy of the House that bill was passed, and I desire now to express my gratitude for the unanimous consent which was then granted for the consideration of the measure.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues from Nebraska on this side of the House have received memorials, petitions, and requests in other forms, asking for this legislation. Such memorials and retitions were forwarded to me; and upon the strength of these applications as a member of the Committee on Public Lands I called up this bill for consideration. I now desire to say that if the care and attention which I devote on the floor of this House to the interests of the people of the State of Nebraska are grounds to indict me as a gentleman who is not "high-minded," I stand here to express my supreme satisfaction in having the indictment which has been presented against me by my irate colleague stand.

Allow me also, Mr. Speaker, to suggest a matter which should have occurred to one who constitutes himself the final arbiter of gentlemanly conduct on this floor, that while since the pussage of this bill in question I have frequently met my colleague and conversed with him, the last time being only a moment before he made his remarkable attack on me, he asked for no explanation, not even made mention of the matter which seems to have been rankling in his breast for five days.

I am quite content to submit the whole matter to my associates

I am quite content to submit the whole matter to my associates who know what gentlemanly conduct is.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Lockwood] such time as he may desire.

Mr. Lockwood. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state in a few words the reason why the bill now under consideration does not seem to me to be of that class or character which ought to receive the approval of this House. The national banks of the country, with rare and infrequent exceptions, have for more than a quarter of a century been intelligently and honestly administered under the law as it stands to-day. Their management has been the pride of their officers and stockholders; and their descriptions have felt in them a safety and security heretofore unservices. been the pride of their oncers and security heretofore un-positors have felt in them a safety and security heretofore un-known with reference to financial institutions. The laws under known with reference to financial institutions. The laws under which they have been managed and operated have become familiar, well defined, and certain; the public has demanded no change of this House or of Congress.

A great business and financial panie came suddenly over the country, and a few of these institutions—a small percentage in comparison with the whole number of national banks—found themselves unable to meet the sudden and universal demand of their depositors. Suspension followed. Among them a few—to the credit of the national banking system be it said, only a few—were found to have been wrecked by their officers. The misconduct of the presidents and cashiers of these few institutions has been the cause and the sole cause of the presentation of this bill to the House at this time.

My position with reference to this measure is this: That it is absolutely powerless for good, and that its passage at this time would work an absolute injury to the national banks and to the people of the country. It only requires a calm and business-like perusal of this bill, in my judgment, to show that it is unadapted to the banking system of this country, either in the large cities or the smaller ones. By its provisions every officer of the bank and I understand from the centleman presenting the bill that (and I understand from the gentleman presenting the bill that this includes all the directors) is compelled, if he desires to obtain a loan, to submit in writing to the officers of the bank and by them to be submitted to a meeting of the directors, or to the executive or finance committee as it is called in many cases, an application for the executive for application for the amount desired to be borrowed.

Another provision declares that in any such banking association, if any official or agent of such association knowingly violates the sections of this act, or aids or abets any such violation, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, and, if I recollect correctly, or by both fine and imprison-ment. That adds nothing by way of penalty to what the present law provides as it stands upon the statute books at this day.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow a correction? Mr. LOCKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. There is no provision in this bill fixing a fine of not less than $5,000."

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I should have said not more than $5,000.
Mr. COX. That is the language of the bill, "not more than $5,000." It is quite an essential difference, the gentleman will see.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes; that is the language of the provi-

But let us see, Mr. Speaker, for a moment the practical working of this bill. A director of a bank, for instance, who is one of the most valuable customers of the bank, in the afternoon at 2 o'clock finds that some one has drawn on him by sight draft, say for $20,000 or $30,000. He has not the cash on deposit in the bank to meet the draft, and yet his business credit, his business reputation demands that that draft shall be met promptly at the time and not be permitted to go to protest or returned. He goes time and not be permitted to go to protest or returned. He goes to the bank, the bank in which he deposits his money, and to the building up of which he devotes his business energies and abilities, and says to the president of the bank, "I want $20,000 immediately to meet a draft just drawn upon me." The president says: "Well, sir, you will have to make an application in writing, and wait until I can get together either the board of directors or the finance committee of the bank." It is then say half past 2 o'clock. It is an absolute impossibility in any banking institution in this part of the country to get either the board of directors or the finance committee together between that time and the time when the draft will go to protest.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. Do you mean that the draft is subject to protest.

Mr. COX. Do you mean that the draft is subject to protest within two hours after it has been received by the bank?
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Many of them are.
Mr. SPRINGER. Without the three days of grace?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Many of them are drawn on sight, without grace.

Mr. COX. I never heard of one being drawn that way.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. That may be, but it is nevertheless a fact.
The president can not get the officers of the bank together to consider the question of the loan; it is manifestly a physical impossibility to do so before the draft will go to protest. What, then, does this director do? He goes to another bank and he

Is he, with his recognized business ability, with his value to the bank as one of its directors, to be compelled to go through all of that paraphernalia to get a discount? Is he going to submit all of that paraphernalia to get a discount? all of that paraphernalia to get a discount? Is he going to submit to it do you think? Do you suppose he will be willing that the entire board of directors shall be able to know just exactly how much money he is drawing out at this moment or borrowing to meet his obligations? Not by any means. He will take his business and his deposits to some other bank.

But they say this is done to give the directors information as to the arrown of money the officers of the board, and described the second of the se to the amount of money the officers of the bank are drawing from the bank. Now, every director of a national bank or any other bank has a perfect right to walk into the bank at any time, to go to the discount ledger and find out exactly how much paper is there discounted for every director or any director or any body else. Then they say it is for additional information to the Comptroller. By the law to-day the Comptroller has a special examiner who goes to the bank and examines it and makes certificate and report as to the amount of money loaned to every director and officer of the bank.

Not only that, but the Comptroller of the Currency can at any time when he sees fit, and certain times are prescribed by law when he must do it, compel the officers of the bank to deliver to him a sworn statement upon which, as the law stands to-day, the cashier and president of the bank are compelled to state not only the amount loaned to each director, but also the amount each director has become indorser for on other paper in the bank. Then it is said, too, it is for the protection of the stockholder and for the protection of the depositor. Where is the protection? If the president and cashler of a bank desire to steal the funds of the bank, I would like to see the law that ever passed this House or any other House which can oppose and prevent it if they are dishonest. It has never been done and never will be done. They need not loan the money to themselves, but can have a convenient friend. Any one can come in for that purpose, and in that way the officer can make off with it. That would obviate this law and dispose of its effect entirely, and thus this bill would have no influence or power to prevent the wrecking of the leak. of the bank

But, sir, the officers and directors of national banks have done But, sir, the officers and directors of national banks have done all that is possible for men to do heretofore to protect these banks, and in the past four months their efforts to prevent the suspension of their banks command the commendation and admiration of the whole financial world. They well knew, and none knew better than they, that suspension meant great embarrassment, not only to the depositors, but also great embarrassment and hardship to the people and the business institutions in the country in which they were located, and incidentally to the whole country.

right here that the presidents of banks are men who should be encouraged and not hampered with adverse legislation, not treated as though they were a set of thieves and scoundrels that were preying upon the money of the depositors of this country. [Applause.]

Many presidents of national banks and many individual directors, in order to save their banks from suspension—not that they were in any wise insolvent—raised from outside sources, from the individual and private securities, and at great pertheir own individual and private securities, and at great personal sacrifies, large sums in currency, and placed them in the banks, in order to supply the demands of depositors, who, as we all know, can at any time withdraw a part or the whole of their deposits. These demands, to the great credit of the banks be it said, were well met, and the country saved, in part at least, from a great financial and business panic.

Do not now, I pray you, embarrass these heroic financiers further by the passage of a law which can only act as an embarrassment and hindrance to their regular business, and cause many of the most honorable and upright business men of the country to refuse to acteither as officers or directors of a national

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Will you yield for a question just

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I understand your statement, coupled with the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], to be that if this bill is passed it will prevent the president and officers of banks, the cashiers and other employes, from borrowing money. I want to know, as you have doubtless had experience with the banks of the city of New York, whether any national bank in the city of New York ever allows its president or cashier to borrow money from the bank?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I can only speak of the banks that I know of personally, in my own part of the country.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. My question is as to the banks of the city of New York.

city of New York. Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. LOCKWOOD. As to that I shall have to refer to some other gontleman, who is familiar with the course of business in the city of New York.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I just wish to make this point. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] made the statement that a man who came with $300,000 in securities, who had to have the money immediately, he being a broker, could not get the money in time to be of use to him. The gentleman spoke, in that connection, of the president and cashier. I wish to make the statement that my information is that the presidents and cushiers of banks in the city of New York are never allowed to borrow any money from their own banks.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. They may perhaps not be allowed to borrow any money; but it was a director who came there and wanted the money, not the president or cashier that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] spoke about.

Mr. BINGHAM. My statement was that the director of a bank, excluded by this act unless it is complied with, being a broker or a banker, coming in at a late hour of the day with a body of securities upon which he had to have money immediately, would be put to great distress in the very bank in which he owned stock, in which he is a stockholder or director, and would have to go to a bank other than his own bank, to give his clientage and his percentages to other banks rather than to his own because of the requirements of this law.

Mr. RAYNER. But it is necessary to have a directors' meeting to get the money anyway.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. RAYNER. There are no daily discounts in any bank un-

Mr. RAYNER. There are no daily discounts in any bank unless the directors meet,
Mr. LOCKWOOD. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars loaned every day in banks all over this country without any meeting of the board of directors.
Mr. RAYNER. That is not done in my city.
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is done in all other large cities.
Mr. RAYNER. In Baltimore the board of directors meet every discount day

Mr. LOCKWOOD. There are discounts in Buffalo, in all of York without meetings of the board of directors.

Mr. RAYNER. Who grant the discounts?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. The president and cashier.

Mr. FITCH. That happens in New York City every day in the year.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Can't you make the president and cashier members of the discount committee?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Then they would form a majority of it, and could borrow the money under the propositions of this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Why have any legislation at all, if the president and cashier are to be a majority of the discount committee?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Why do you want to legislate against

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Why do you want to legislate against these individual men?
Mr. HALL of Missouri. I will answer it. For the very reason that it has a tendency to prevent these men from robbing the hanks, the very thing the Comptroller of the Currency, not only this one but every other one, has tried to prevent.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Right there I want to correct you. The present Comptroller of the Currency has never sanctioned this bill. On the contrary, my information is that he disapproves of this bill. And I will say further, that he oughtnot to commend any such bill as this. Now, I beg to complete my statement without being interrupted. I say this further, that by the passage of this bill.

Mr. COX. Will you yield to me for one moment?
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes.
Mr. COX. I gave you the floor yesterday.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Certainly.
Mr. COX. Let me ask you this. You stated that your president and your cashier are members of your finance committee, or your executive committee; the name is not important.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes.
Mr. COX. Now then the present a substitute.

Mr. COX. Now, then, the paper is submitted to them, as you stated to the House a moment ago.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. COX. Do you Yes. Mr. COX. Do you mean that that paper is discounted without consultation with the directors? Now, tell me what object tion there is to that executive or financial committee reporting it back to the board of directors and making a record on their

Mr. LOCKWOOD. My dear sir, what would be the use of, Mr. LOCK WOOD. My dear sir, what would be the use of, after it had been discounted, their reporting it back, when they will not have a chance, perhaps, to report it back to the board of directors for one or two months after the money has been borrowed? It would be of no benefit or information to the board of directors. Any member of the board of directors can look at the discount ledgers and see at any time what is going on and what discounts there are recorded in that book.

what discounts there are recorded in that book.

Mr. COX. Do you mean to say that your directors do not meet in less than two or three months?

Mr. LOCK WOOD. I state with great frankness that in many of these large banks the board of directors do not meet more than once a month or two months, and there is no law requiring them to meet at any specific time, except twice each year.

Mr. DUNPHY. But they are at the bank every day.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Furthermore, if this bill is passed, it will cause many of the most active, upright, and business-like men of the country to refuse to act either as officers or directors of national banks. All will concede that a national bank, to be successful, must have for its stockholders, directors, and officers, active, wide-awake business men. The stockholders select the directors, and the directors in turn select the officers of the bank, rectors, and the directors in turn select the officers of the bank. the most competent and trustworthy men they can find. All undirectors of the bank.

All understand full well that the value of their stock and the success of the bank depends upon the confidence of the people in the judgment and wisdom shown in the selection of the officers and directors of the bank.

Why should Congress now seek to destroy this confidence in the officers of national banks? It certainly will do much to destroy confidence by the passage of an act which virtually impugns the honesty and integrity of all bank officers, as this bill does. The confidence of the people has been for many months and is still sorely tested. It is in my judgment far better for the people, far better for the stockholders, and far better for the depositors, and best for the interests of this country to cease these attacks upon the national banks and the other banks of the coun-Stop this legislation and let the law as it stands remain unchanged.

The future success of national banks depends upon the confidence of the people in their faithful and honest administration. The law as it stands to-day punishes with severe penalty every violation either by the officers or directors of a bank who commit any offenses by which any of the moneys of the bank are diverted from their legitimate and honest purpose. Banks are an absolute necessity for the management of public business. Their future prosperity depends largely upon the lawmaking power not interfering with the just absolute and well-settled laws as they have existed for so many years.

And I will say right here, that there has not been an offense

And I will say right here, that there has not been an offense And I will say right here, that there has not been an offense committed by any national bank officer, either president or cashier, that it has not been in the power of the Government for the last twenty-five years, at any time, to have that man indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced under the law as it stands to-day, and more quickly and more certainly than by the bill which you have here at the present time. Pass this bill and you strike a blow at the national-bank system of this country.

The laws now relating to national banks are strict, and so ironclad are the penalties for their violation, so severe the punishment, so certain to follow their violation, that men of high standing and men of high responsibility hesitate, greatly hesitate, to ing and men of high responsibility hesitate, greatly hesitate, to become directors of national banks; and the only reason why you can induce a proper man to become a director in a national bank is the reason that he has become the owner of large blocks of stock in the bank and feels compelled to aid in caring for his own property. For no other purpose and for no other reason can you induce any man to assume the responsibility of putting himself under the law, strict and sovere as it stands to-day, and under its penalties and liabilities to become a director of a national bank. National banks are fast disappearing in my city; out of twenty-four or twenty-five banks and banking institutions, all are State banks except two. We have only two national all are State banks except two. We have only two national banks in the city.

I am not, and I do not wish to be understood as being, in favor of any loose or dishonest system of banking, either under legislation by the Federal Government or by the States. I am in favor of the strictest, the most honorable, the most honest system of banking that can be secured by legislation. But I do say that when you bring in a bill of this kind simply because of the thieving speculations of the few bank presidents and enshiers, you are throwing in the face of the hundreds and thousands of honest and honorable bank presidents, cashiers, and directors in this country an imputation that they are not to be trusted by the public

I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Speaker, for another reason, because, as is stated in the report of the minority, it is of a paternal character, a kind of legislation that ought not to become a settled or fixed rule in this House. I believe, sir, that the future success of our banking system in this country will depend upon your leaving it in the hands of honest men, under honest and your leaving it in the hands of honest men, under honest and fixed laws, and not by perpetually or annually changing your laws. The present banking laws have stood the test of time. Good judgment, good legislation, and good financiering each and all alike demand that they remain undisturbed.

Mr. PAGE. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not true that under the present law the bank examiner, appointed by the Government of the state of the state ernment, has the right to go into any national bank and examine its books on any day he chooses, without notice to the bank?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Certainly. The examiner may go, on any day, at any hour, and demand to see the books, and the whole bank must be virtually closed up for the purpose of his examination. Not only that, but the Comptroller of the Currency can on any day demand a report from a national bank, not of that day, but of any previous day that he sees fit to select, and from the books of the bank the officers must make a sworn report as to the condition of the institution on that day.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have five minutes of my hour left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield that time to the gentleman

Mr. CANNON of fillnois. I yield that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, very little can be said in the few minutes allowed me, but I desire to make one statement. The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. Cox] has cited the case of the Maverick Bank as one of his illustrations to show the necessity for this legislation. I am not a defender of the Maverick Bank, or of the Keystone Bank, or of the Spring Garden Bank, or of any of these banks which have been broken and de-stroyed by maladministration or unlawful action on the part of their officials; but this fact ought to be stated, for it is a matter of history, that in every case where the officers of a national bank have been guilty of these violations of law, when they have been called to account, they have either committed suicide or they are to-day in the penitentiary. The crime is a great one, and to many death is preferable to life branded with dishonor and crime.

The history of every one of these bank failures has been a tragedy. In the case of the Maverick Bank, Mr. Potter, the president, had associated with him one Irving A. Evans in stockbrokerage business. The firm failed, and Evans shot himself. Magruder, the bank-examiner, who was under the control of the bank officials, was in impaired health, and when his assistant took possession of the Maverick Bank he died on the next day. suddenly. The president and eashier of the Spring Garden Bank are to-day in the penitentiary for a term of ten years. The president of the Keystone Bank is a fugitive from justice, and the bookkeeper is undergoing imprisonment for a term of ten years. In other words, wherever there has been a violation of law by the officers of a national bank affecting the protection of the depositors and the stockholders, a tragedy or imprisonment has followed.

Now, as I said yesterday, the present Secretary of the Trea Now, as I said yesterday, the present secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, was of the committee that made the investigation of the Maverick Bank, and Mr. BRICE, Mr. HIGGINS, Mr. PEFFER, and Mr. CHANDLER were also members of that committee. If the gentleman referred to, connected with that bank, is now at large, it must be through some dereliction of that committee, or else because there could not be a case made against him in the United States courts.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have only four minutes.

Mr. COX. I yielded to you very cheerfully yesterday.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have only four minutes, so the gentleman will understand that I have no time to spare. I want to say this further in reference to these national banks, that they can not have a spare in their administration a body of directors all the have present in their administration a body of directors all the time. The directors are stockholders and generally depositors in their own bank, from which they receive, as a matter of course, courtesy and accommodation in preference to outsiders. The limitations of the law indicate the amount allowed to be loaned to any man appealing to the bank, and when these gentlemen make their applications for discount the law runs, and it is the duty of the bank examiner to be so thoroughly familiar with the several banks in his district, by frequent examinations, that he can easily tell whether there has been any violation of the law or not. The trouble has been, in relation to these many failures of banks, that the examiners have not carried out the instruc-tions of the Department and the injunctions of the law.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by agreement between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and myself the debate is to be extended until 3 o'clock, when the previous question is to be ordered. The gentleman from Illinois is to control half the time the SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition to the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending bill be extended until 3 o'clock; that at that hour the previous question tended until 3 o'clock; that at that hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and any pending amendments, and that the time intervening, thirty-two minutes and a half, shall be controlled, one-half of it by him, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox], and the other by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon]. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX. 1 [Mr. HARTER] I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to occupy much of the time of the House; but I favor the bill now before us. I believe that any measure, which will restrict the power of bank officers who borrow the funds of the bank must be wholesome and need not be onerous. I shall therefore vote for the bill. I should vote for it with much more heartiness if it extended farther than it does. I think this measure may lead up in the end to a bill which will be very much more useful, a bill which will absolutely and irrevocably prohibit the president, the vice-president, the cashier, teller, bookkeeper, or any other employé of a bank from borrowing under any circumstances whatever the money of the institution with which he may be connected.

Such a restriction of course ought not to extend to men whose sole connection with the bank is that of stockholder and director; for the reason that under the operation of such a restriction it might be almost impossible to secure for the board of direction the class of men who would be most valuable. Hence I say that the power of a man to borrow money if his sole connection with the bank is that of stockholder and director ought not to be abridged any more than that of the outside public; because it is very advantageous to be able to secure upon a bank board in any of our cities the attendance and advice of some man, for instance, who is a wholesale dry goods merchant, of another who is a good lawyer, of another who is engaged in manufacturing, another who may be a wholesale dealer in groceries; and so on. It is very immay be a wholesale dealer in groceries; and so on. It is very important to have directors of this class, because their knowledge portant to have directors of this class, because their knowledge with respect to trade and their familiarity with the business ability and credit of the men applying for discounts is of great service to the bank. Such men as I have indicated are often obliged to borrow money for the needs of their own current business; and if, as directors, they were prohibited from borrowing they would be obliged to decline serving upon the board.

But these considerations do not apply to the men directly in charge of the business of the bank and in control of its funds. The nearer you can come to making the actual bank officers, those in charge of the business of the bank, trustees for the safety of the capital and the deposits of the bank, the better it

I shall vote for this bill, regretting, as I have said, that it does not reach farther than it does, for I should like, as I have said, to see its provisions extended so as to prevent officers directly interested in the control of the bank from borrowing money from it under any circumstances whatever.

Mr. DINGLEY. You object, then, to the pending amendment to insert the word "directors."

Mr. HARTER. I object to that amendment.

Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARTER. I will be glad if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] will yield me two minutes that I may give that time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER].
Mr. COX. That is all right.

That is all right.

Mr. COX. That is all right.
Mr. HARTER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER].
Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to disagree on this question with eminent gentlemen on my own side of the House for whom I have the greatest respect. I have had some little experience as a business man: I have been and am the director of a bank; I am also a depositor in banks; and I am, unterpretable a fractional horrower from the banks. frtunstely, a frequent borrower from the banks.

Now, it seems to me that this bill, so far as it goes, is simply a bill for the safety of the stockholders and depositors of these in I can not see how legitimate business can be in any way retarded by requiring that the president, cashier, teller, and other officers of the bank must consult the board of direct. and other officers of the bank must consult the board of directors before they borrow the money of the bank. If in opposition to this proposition it be said that the president or cashier may desire to speculate in stocks, and for that purpose may wish to deposit securities and borrow upon them, it does not seem to me that that is a kind of business which we as members of Congress should be particularly anxious to advance.

of Congress should be particularly anxious to advance.
It is said by some gentlemen that the law as it stands is sufficiently stringent. In answer to that suggestion, I wish to refer to our recent experience in the State of Massachusetts in the case of the Maverick Bank. Under the present law, as I understand that case has been decided, it is held that the president and directors of a bank may take the money of the stockholders and depositors, may go into stock speculation with that money; if they win, pay the bank back, and if they lose, the depositors and the stockholders lose their money.

Mr. COX. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Heard].

Mr. Heard. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment in order that it may be considered pending when the time comes for its consideration. My amendment is to insert after the word "quorum," in line 12 on page I, the words "and then not in excess of the amount now allowed bylaw." While this amendment may not be necessary, I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] that it can do no harm, and it may serve a useful nurpose. useful purpose.

I wish to say only one or two words in regard to the general policy of this bill. As just stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Draper] the bill is designed to affect a very small percentage of the business done by any bank. It does not affect the general business of the banks at all; and as to the business which it does affect, it is only wise, it is only justice to the depositors and stockholders of these institutions that such restrictions should be imposed.

Referring to the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOCKWOOD], to the effect that this measure is an assault upon the credit of the banks and is calculated to impair the confidence which the people repose in these institutions. I beg to take issue with him. My judgment is that you will strengthen the confidence of the people in these institutions by throwing around the officers who conduct them such legal restrictions as will prevent them from making the scandalous misuse which has, in some instances, recently been made of the money of the people to the great detriment of the depositors and stockholders, as well as to the discredit of the institutions themselves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. Montgomery]. Does the gentleman from Missouri offer his amendment now?

Mr. HEARD. I have offered it to be considered pending when the previous question shall apply.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "quorum," in line 12, page 1, insert the words "and then not in excess of the amount allowed by law."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS].
Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, let us see what a national bank is. In the first place, the stockholders are the owners of the bank. The directors are merely the agents of the the stockholders. They are also trustees for the stockholders. the stockholders. and under certain circumstances and in certain cases they also become trustees for the creditors.

Now, the stockholders have a perfect remedy for the malfeasance in office of any director. If they have a dishonest director ance in omce of any director. If they have a dishonest director they can turn him out. Banking can not be done unless full faith be had in the men that manage the banks. The integrity of the managers is the safety of any bank.

As my colleague [Mr. Lockwood] says, you may pass all the penal laws the statute books will hold, and you can not prevent stealing. So the remedy is in the hands of the stockholders for improper conduct of directors. improper conduct of director

Again, the president and the cashier and the other officers of the bank are the agents of the directors, and the directors have the entire power to change them at will. Now, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this is one of that class of bills which come from influences hostile to the national banks. If you want to break down the national banks bring in a bill for that purpose and wipe them out of existence, but do not attack them in a surreptitious way like this. Why, these national banks are the very best we have. They are loaded down with all the weight they can carry.

In my own town we have eight State banks and two national banks. The national banks are in every way the best in the country. Weight them down a little further, and they will have to go out of existence as national banks and become State banks, and everywhedy knows everywhere throughout the country. to go out of existence as national banks and become State banks, and everybody knows everywhere throughout the country that the State bank furnishes no better security to the depositor than that furnished by the national banks. We want to maintain the national banks, and I say again let the enemies of those banks come to the front squarely, and say that they want to legislate national banks out of existence and present a bill for that purpose, and not attack them in the insidious manner in which this till makes the assault. hill makes the assault

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say I desire to direct

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say I desire to direct more particularly to the proposed amendment to include in this bill the directors of national banks.

I am a friend to the national banks because I believe that they I am a friend to the national banks because I believe that they give life and energy to the business of the country, and that without them we should be substantially unable to do business in a safe and speedy manner. These banks take care of the money of their depositors without charge, and depend on loans made for profits in the business. They should not be embarrassed. The directors are chosen for their business capacity and integrity, they having little to do with handling the money. Practically they stand in the same footing with outsiders so far as borrowing at the banks is concerned.

tional banks will be, in the smaller towns, to substantially paralyze the business carried on by many of the directors of the banks. In the smaller towns, as in the town where I reside, and the smaller cities of the country, the directors of the national banks are made up of the business men of the town, merchants and men engaged in actual business. These men never know twenty-four engaged in actual business. I ness men never know twenty-four or forty-eight hours, or three or four days in advance, exactly what their needs are to be in conducting their business. When they desire to borrow money it is in some emergency that usually comes upon them suddenly. Now, in the afternoon perhaps ally comes upon them suddenly. Now, in the afternoon perhaps they find that in order to meet their engagements they need to borrow five hundred or a thousand or two thousand dollars or five thousand dollars.

It is to be supposed that the other officers of the bank know the directors; it is to be supposed that the other officers of a bank and the stockholders have considered whether these men are good or not; and it is to be supposed that all know the business standing of the directors of the bank, that reasonable consideration has been given to their applications for loans before, and whether or not it is proper to loan money to them again, to continue making loans and whether it is improper undersorted. continue making loans, and whether it is improper under any circumstances to loan a reasonable amount of money to these men. Should loans to directors be considered improper there would be some prohibition placed on the officers of the bank having the some prohibition placed on the officers of the bank having the making of loans in charge.

Now, if you say these men can not borrow of the bank when the emergency arises in their business and can not get a fund to remit to New York or some other city, a thousand or two thousand dollars, as the case may be until a meeting has been called to consider the application, they will find it absolutely impossible to meet their engagements on the day when they mature and their paper away from home will go to protest and they will be otherwise embarrassed. Therefore you will not only embarrasse otherwise embarrassed. Therefore you will not only embarrass the bank, but impair its business as well as the business of the director without doing any good in the way of securing the bank or its depositors against loss. You are doing no good by including the directors in this proposition, but are doing great harm not only to them, but to the business men with whom they deal in other towns, and through them to the business of the entire country

There are many objections to all of the features and provisions of this bill, but this proposed amendment is especially obnoxious. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is at all necessary to say, by insinuation, that we believe the presidents and officers of the national banks of this country of ours are thieves or dis-The presumption is that they are honest men; the presumption is they will not steal. There are laws which I believe to be sufficient now on the statute books providing for the punishment of these men, when they overstep the bounds pre-scribed by the law in the performance of their functions. I shall, however, make no objection to the bill as it stands, but only to this proposition to include directors of national banks within the terms of the bill. To that I do object, and if it is incorporated therein I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield a minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER].

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, my time was so short that I was unable to say what I desired to say before closing, which was that I was opposed to the amendment excluding directors. in favor of the bill so far as it applies to the president, cashier, and other officers, but not in so far as it applies to directors, who are not salaried officers of banks, and who only act in directors' meetings

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] that he occupy ten minutes of his time The gentleman to whom I propose to yield is not quite

Mr. COX. There are a number of gentlemen who have been begging for time, but who are not on the floor at this moment.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. him if that is not sufficient.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, one of my objections to this proposed legislation is, first, that I think the safeguards that are now a part of the law fully protect the general administration of national banks.

I do not believe it to be wise, in view of the history of national banks in this country—with their acknowledged usefulness, with their trial periods that have been gone through, with the ac-ceptance by the people of the established system that exists today -- to go into any of the details of bank management by further day-to go into any or the details of bank management by further legislation.

This is distinctly an inroad upon the directorship control of moneys of their own and moneys of their customers, in a line of detail that I think neither wise nor justified by any of the experiences in the history of national banks, although there have been many failures and although there have been many defalcations.

The general business of country national banks is entirely and radically different from the business of banks in the great centers of money, of commercial and manufacturing industry. In my own city of Philadelphia the banks, at the later hours of the day, are literally overrun with the brokers of the city, negotiating their loans, either time or call loans.

What is called the general discount paper, as a rule, goes fore either the finance committee or the body of the board of directors; that is, one or two name paper, upon which there is no collateral save the good repute of the merchant, his standing in the bank as a depositor, and the knowledge on the part of the business men on the board of directors as to his standing in either the commercial or the industrial line of work in which he is engaged. But in the great cities, the large business of the banks is in the line of their relations with the brokers.

The brokers give to the banks better security than your one or two name paper. They bring to the bank securities of positive actual value. They must have the money at once, within five minutes, in order that they may close the transactions of the day. When you consider that New York at times negotiates six hundred thousand shares of stock in a day, all of which go through the banking operations of that great city, you can form some idea of the necessity for closing transactions quickly. My own city of Philadelphia, and Boston, negotiate, through their brokers, hundreds of thousands of shares of stock a day, running into the millions of dollars, and all these negotiations must be into the millions of dollars, and all these negotiations must be perfected within a short time.

That occurs every day in the year. The board that passes upon this class of securities consists generally of the president, upon this class of securities consists generally of the president, vice-president, and cashier. It is not a question of judgment with them as to the standing of the men who offer the paper, as it is in the discounting of one or two name paper, but the broker brings in collateral. They know the marketprice by looking at the tape or at the daily list. You know that Manhattan is worth over a hundred. You know that Pennsylvania Railroad, New York Central, and Union Pacific are worth so much. They borrow upon cell. The banks can cell upon they to move the property that row upon call. The banks can call upon them to-morrow for the repayment of the money.

No board of directors can be assembled to pass judgment upon these loans. These gentlemen are pursuing their individual lines of business, for they are paid no compensation for their bank work. These questions can best be and are trusted to the officers of the bank.

officers of the bank. Now, what is called defalcation on the part of the officers of national banks has been the exception in the history of banking. The directors are taken from a body of business men. They can not give their whole time to the business of the bank. No salary is connected with that honorable place. They are there for the protection of their stock, for the protection of their own deposits, because they go to their own banks to make their deposits, and to pass judgment upon the paper of the business men of the community with whose standing they are familiar.

They are there when the general discount business is to be considered, when exceptional loans are to be made, and to generally examine at fixed stated times the business of the bank. simply object to this proposition because I believe it is a line of legislation that would trench upon the well-established, the wellexperienced, safe, and acceptable modes of conducting our banks as they exist to-day. The trouble in the past has been that the bank examiners, the executors of your law, have failed to do their full duty. I do not know whether the head of the Department has been derelictor simply the bank examiners; but in the case of the Maverick Bank there were five examinations, so Mr.

He says:

The most appalling feature of the Maverick Bank failure was the method of false returns resorted to in order to keep a knowledge of the true condition of the bank from appearing in the five returns sent each year to the Com troiler of the Currency.

It will be seen from the foregoing portions of this report that the committee had no difficulty, from the very commencement of the inquiry, in reaching the discovery that the disastrous failures of national banks have nearly all resulted from two concurring causes, as follows:

I. Excessive loans beyond the lawful limit to officers or stockholders of the banks.

2. The unfaithfulness of the bank examiners who, through gross neglect or from corrupt motives, have failed to make full and accurate reports to the Comptroller of the Currency.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield the gentleman one minute more if he desires to finish his statement.
Mr. BINGHAM. I desire one minute more.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire one minute more.

No system of law can prevent conspiracy in a national bank, and no system of law can prevent an expert housebreaker from breaking into my house. If a national bank-official is dishonest and a man who proposes to use the money of the depositors for his own purpose, and loses the same in speculation, I can say this, that the history of national banks follows the history of recent years, that a man either goes behind the bars of the pent-tentiary or commits suicide, and you can not by this enactment or any other enactment make men honest who are dishonest. say that I believe your law as it exists to-day on the statute book is far better than this proposed legislation, and if wisely, judiciously, faithfully, and honestly carried out will protect the national-bank system as it now exists. [Applause.]

tional-bank system as it now exists. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, let us just for a moment brush the undergrowth out of the way, and clear the trash that has been thrown into this matter, and see what the real facts are. A large part of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is that we have 600,000 stock transactions in one day in the city of New York, or 100,000 in the city of Boston, in the period of twenty-four hours, and they shall all be settled in a period of five minutes. He intimates that all this is to be done away with in the event this bill is passed, and that this bill is an attack or injury on the bank dipassed, and that this bill is an attack or injury on the bank di-

The gentleman has failed to recognize one fact, Mr. Speaker, and that is the fact that when a man becomes a director of a bank he takes the position, if he accepts the position, of a trustee with regard to the money of the stockholders and the depositors in that bank, and he has no right, and no trustee has any right, to handle funds that are intrusted to his charge, or if he is han-dling funds that he shall not handle them without legal restric-

Let us notice another of the sophistries indulged in by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Lockwood]. I will take his argument and that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] and put them together. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Lockwood] objects to the bill on account of the restriction on bank officers being too severe. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lockwood] objects to the bill on account of the restriction on bank officers being too severe. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lockwood] objects to the bill on account of the restriction on bank officers being too severe. linois [Mr. Cannon] says that the restriction amounts to nothing on earth to a dishonest bank director. Now, let us simply place the two arguments together and let them devour themselves, and either one of them will have small food to work

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference, that this bill throws around the directors and officers of the banks an additional restriction or incentive to honesty. I mean by that incentive to honesty, that punishment will be certain when a man is found to be dishonest. I do not suppose that this will be indorsed by dishonest directors of a bank or dishonest

No rogue ere felt the halter draw With good opinion of the law.

It is for the purpose of protecting the stockholders, the directors and the depositors from dishonesty, and that rolls up into the millions. The depositors in a bank that has been robbed in this manner have no remedy, because of the insolvency of the bank; and in the miserable transaction of incarceration of the dishonest man in a prison you may satisfy the criminal law of the United States, but the injury received to the country is as set forth in the report of the committee upon this matter. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that further time need be spent upon this matter Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Balley].

Mr. Balley. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to detain the House if the gentleman from Tennessee wishes to bring the debate to a conclusion now.

debate to a conclusion now.

Mr. COX. I have no control of the time on the other side.

That belongs to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who still believe in the wisdom of leaving every man as free as possible to manage his own affairs in his own way, unvexed by the interference of the law. It too often happens that in some particular community there occurs a case of peculiar hardship, and gen-tlemen imagine that the plague is about to become universal, and they straightway appeal for legislation on the subject. For my part, I do not think that a general law ought ever to be enacted except in response to some pressing need and to serve some great and useful public purpose. I can not bring myself to think that the evil at which this bill aims is so serious or so extensive as to justify Congress in entering still further upon the minute and specific regulation of the dealings between the banks of this country and their customers.

It is true, sir, that a dishonest officer will sometimes despoil the bank and rob the stockholder, and even the depositor, but I undertake to say that in nine cases out of every ten of that kind which have occurred it could have been prevented by a reasonable enforcement of our existing laws; and this bill, if it becomes a law, will simply embarrass the honest men who could use the accommodation without loss to the banks, but banks for their will not deter the thieves.

I can see no necessity, sir, for still further divesting the men who own a bank of their right and power to direct its affairs. Is it to be done for the benefit of the depositor? Mr. Speaker, waiving all question as to how far it is proper for the Government to interfere between the banks and their depositors, I submit to the candid judgment of the House that the losses which depositors have sustained have not been such as to warrant this House in passing this bill. During the more than thirty years since the inauguration of this banking system, depositors have lost less than $10,000,000; which means that in all that time they have lost less than one-half of I per cent of the present deposits on a system can apply less than one of this banking system. ent deposits, or an average annual loss of less than one-fiftieth of 1 per cent. Reflect upon it, sir! A loss of less than one-fiftieth of 1 per cent under what is admitted to have been a lax and inefficient administration of the law, and yet we are confronted with a demand for more restrictions upon the right of men to control their own property.

Sir, it seems to me that instead of yielding to this demand for more law it would be better to trust the men having money to deposit to look more to the honesty of the officers and less to the rigor of the law. There are many men engaged in the national banking business to-day who could not carry one-tenth of their present deposits if it were not for a vague and indefinite idea which possesses the minds of many people that, somehow or somehow else, the law will take care of their money.

Instead of multiplying the regulations of law until men come to rely upon them for protection and security, it would be the wiser plan to so frame your legislation that none but men of high character and integrity will be trusted with the money of the

The best service this Congress can do this country under present conditions is to repeal many laws and make no new ones. except such as are absolutely necessary. Instead of committing the Federal Government still more closely to the national banking system we would deserve better of our constituents if we would lead off in the opposite direction of divorcing this Government from all banks and banking systems. We need to be schooled again in that wisest of all legislative maxims that "the people are governed best who are governed least." I believe it was Tacttus who said that there is no surer evidence of a nation's decay than the multiplicity of its laws, and the history of all governments has confirmed him in his declaration. Usually it is true that the size of their code is a good index to the character and habits of a people. A model state is one in which there are but few laws and every one of them well and faithfully executed; and a wise legislator ought to insist upon enforcing the laws which we already have rather than encumber the statute book with new ones. When I asked my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] yesterday if it were not true in nearly all the cases where national banks had become insolvent through the mismanagement or defalcation of their officers, that the enforcement of the existing law would have prevented the result, he replied that it was. I submit to him, then, that instead of he replied that it was.

making more laws we should enforce the ones we have, and upon that idea, Mr. Speaker, I shall cast my vote against this

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I reserve the balance of my time,

Mr. Speaker Mr. COX. We have the conclusion of the debate on this side,

I believe.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does the gentleman propose to take

Mr. COX. No, sir; but when the time comes to conclude the debate I shall yield to the chairman of the committee that reported the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will reserve my time, though I do

Mr. CANNON of Hillots. I will reserve my time, though I do not know that I shall use it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaksr, I have listened patiently to all this discussion, and I must say with the utmost respect that I have been astonished at some of the arguments which have been made. The matter seems to me to involve a very plain proposition. A director of a bank (and this seems to be the point on which the argument hinges) has been decided by every court of the United States to be a trustee. He is the trustee, not only for the depositors States to be a trustee. He is the trustee, not only for the depositors but for the stockholders. Now, let me submit a very plain proposition of law. Here is a trustee who controls funds belonging to others. Associated with him are other trustees with similar authority and acting in the same capacity. Now, when he comes to deal with this trust fund placed in his hands, is it unreasonable to say to him, "We will put such a restraint on you that you can not use the funds belonging to others until you submit your proposition to your cotrustees"?

proposition to your cotrustees If such a proposition were made as a matter of State law, gentlemen would readily concede its propriety. But here the proposition to put restrictions around a trustee, so that he shall not improperly use the funds belonging to others is met with the objection that such a restriction will embarrass him in his busi-

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow a single sugges-

Mr. COX. I have but a moment.

Mr. BAILEY. I venture to say that there is not a line in the law books treating bank deposits as trust funds. Such funds are the money of the bank, and the bank becomes a debtor to the de-positor. That has been decided by every court that has ever passed on the question.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman undertake to say that bank directors are not trustees?

Mr. BAILEY. They are trustees for the bank, but not for

Mr. DATIET. They are transfer to the depositors.

Mr. COX. Then let me ask the gentleman how it is that the liability attaches not only to the stockholders but to the directors in case there is any destruction of this trust fund?

Mr. DATIET. They are transfer to the directors in case there is any destruction of this trust fund?

Mr. BAILEY. That results from positive law, not by reason of any trusteeship.

Mr. COX. Let me submit a question to the gentleman from Texas, as he has interrupted me: Suppose a director in a bank, with the consent of his codirectors, appropriates the funds of the bink to his own use; does the gentleman insist he is not

Mr. BAILEY. He would go to the penitentiary, under the statute law of the United States.

Mr. COX. What good does it do to send a man who is insolvent to the penitentiary—a man who has taken the money of other people? That does not return the money. There is the trouble.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to occupy only a few moments in pressing this point, and I will not occupy further time. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCK-DALE

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, the result of the existing law is that the depositor has practically no choice as to where he will deposit his money. The United States Government laid its hand upon and destroyed every State bank wherein the citizen might have chosen to make his deposits. He is, therefore, by the law of the United States driven to deposit his money, if at all, in a United States bank.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman must excuse me; I have but four minutes, and I wish to direct attention to another point. having destroyed the other banks, it should make depositors in the United States banks as safe as possible. And the fact that gentlemen having these extraordinary privileges, controlling United States banks created in this way, resent any interference by the Government with what they call their business is a very suspicious circumstance

According to the last accounts they owe 0. Those depositors put their money ime as this. When they come to get it positors $2,020,000,000. depositors $1,700,000,000. Those do there for just such a time as this. there for just such a time as this. When they come to get it they are answered that the bank can not pay them; and it goes on dealing with their money. Other banks answer that the president or the cashier has squandered the money—

Mr. KYLE. "Borrowed" it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. "Borrowed" the money, as my colleague suggests; and the cashier and president, when the depositors want to see them, are in Canada or Kamskatka!

Now, I say—and this is all I want to say—that the United States ought to enlarge, as proposed in this bill, the restrictions upon these people, so that they will not be able to accept the deposits of their fellow-citizens and then loan them to themselves, lose these people, so that they will not be able to accept the deposits of their fellow-citizens and then loan them to themselves, lose them in speculations, and then flee the country, leaving nobody responsible. This enlargement of the present restriction hurts no honest man, but bears heavily upon dishonest men.

If depositors have not now sufficient safeguards, if the officers appointed by the Government to look into these institutions have neglected their duty, so that officers of the bank have been enabled to speculate with the money received from depositors and then when the money has been called for have been found wanting, it is wise to enlarge the restriction so that the directors or executive committees of banks in such cases may not complace ntly answer that the cashier and the president have complacently answer that the cashier and the president have done the mischief and have absented themselves. The directors should make themselves responsible for these transactions con-should make themselves responsible for these transactions connected with the loaning of money, should put the matter upon record, so that they may be called upon to answer for the use or misuse of the money of the people.

The people who deposited their money in these banks can not go and look after the management of the institutions. They do not want to be told, when they go for their money and expect to receive it, that it has been squandered or stolen. When a man goes for his money to meet the circumstances of such a time as this or to meet sighness or business engagements or is out of this, or to meet sickness or business engagements, or is out of employment—and most of the depositors are small ones—they want to be told, "Here is your money," or told why it is not

Therefore it is the duty of the Government-not only good policy to pass the bill promoted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox], but I concede it to be the absolute duty of the Government, when it is responsible for these institutions, to se-Government, when it is responsible for these institutions, to secure to the people who deposit their money in them the right to receive their money on demand, or when they want it, and they ought not to be answered that the Government officers are inefficient. That is in fact the strongest argument I have heard for the passage of the bill, that the Government officials and inspectors of banks have failed to discharge their duties. Let us put it somewhere where they can not fail to discharge their

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this bill there have been some amendments offered to it, merely to change the verbiage, and I thought they would be considered with the bill. But to reach all the amendments, and to avoid any confusion on that point, I offer the bill which I now send to the desk as a substitute for the pending bill. There is no change in the bill, I will state to the House, except that it includes the various amendments indicated. The word "director" is iu, and the other amendments, and the same exception to the liability of the men who borrow money. There is also an amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hall] which includes the idea that this provision of law now in force shall be continued, that no one shall draw from the bank beyond the legal limit. I do not ask for the reading of the substitute now.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the substitute had better be read. We are to have further discussion, and some of us may like to nsider and discuss the amendments proposed in the substitute

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, the result of the existing aw is that the depositor has practically no choice as to where will deposit his money. The United States Government laid the hand upon and destroyed every State bank wherein the citiven might have chosen to make his deposits. He is, therefore, by the law of the United States driven to deposit his money, if tall, in a United States bank.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to call the attention of the gendleman to the fact—

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman must excuse me; I have been uniquely minutes, and I wish to direct attention to another point. Now, the Government having furnished these depositories and the United States banks as safe as possible. And the fact that gentlemen having these extraordinary privileges, controlling United States banks created in this way, resent any interference by the Government with what they call their business is a very unsticious circumstance.

Not long ago the national banks of the country owed the dement to the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would not be in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. The amendments are now pending as far as they are admissible under the rules.

Mr. COX. I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If my colleague desires the time to which I am entitled I will also yield it to him, so that he will have a quarter of an hour at his disposal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. CANNON] has kindly yielded me the portion of time, also, to which he is entitled.

If I can get the attention of the House I will endeavor to explain, briefly, this bill. The Committee on Banking and Currency, in reporting the proposition, have shown no disposition whatever to embarrass or cripple in any way the operation of the national banking laws. On the contrary, it is the opinion of this committee that the propositions contained in this bill are very reasonable and can work no harm or injury to anyone who is engaged in honest and legitimate banking business; and that they are such as will meet the approval, generally, of those en-they are such as will meet the approval, generally, of those engaged in the national banking business.

Two Comptrollers of the Currency, one, Mr. Lacey, known to every member of this House, as he was formerly a member of this body, the other, the late Comptroller, Mr. HEPBURN, have specifically recommended to Congress the adoption of the provision which has been reported in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will pardon me. They do

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will pardon me. They do not recommend the inclusion of the directors. They expressly declare that that should not be included.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. HEPBURN did recommend that directors be allowed to borrow upon the same terms as other persons will read from the report of 1892, by Mr. HEPBURN, page 41:

There is no reason why a director should not borrow money of his bank upon the same terms and conditions that other patrons are accommodated. There is every reason why he should not take advantage of his position to secure better rates or greater accommodations than his bank equities entitle him to. Officers of a bank should not be allowed to borrow money by overdrawing their accounts, by putting tickets in the cash, by discounting their own notes, or by discounting their business paper, or in any way except by application to the board of directors; and a law regulating such loans would be a wise enactment.

That is the recommendation of Mr. HEPBURN.

Comptroller Lacey went much further. In his report of 1891, page 31, he said:

The Comptroller, therefore, takes this opportunity to recommend that the active officers of a bank be excluded from incurring liabilities to the association with which they are connected, and that the direct and indirect is billities of a director be confined to 30 per cent of the paid-up capital, leaving the limitations contained in section 5200 United States Revised Statutes intact.

The Comptroller is also of the opinion that the publication of the liabilities of officers and directors would afford a valuable safeguard—

Just such publication as is required by this bill.

Comptroller Lacey makes this further statement, to which I wish every member of this House to give attention, because we all know that Mr. Lacey was a very conservative officer, who so ably managed the business of his office during his term that he was called to the head of one of the largest banks in the city of Chicago, and now occupies that position as a national banker.

Mr. Lacey says: The active officers of the bank, who are charged with the custody of its assets and the handling of its funds, should not, in my opinion, be permitted to appear as borrowers or become in any way liable to the association with which they are connected.

That is the recommendation of one of the ablest Comptrollers of the Currency we ever had, that the officers should not borrow anything from the banks.

Mr. Lacey further says:

While this might work hardship in exceptional cases, it would, without doubt, add greatly to the security of the creditors of the bank as a whole. It would be unwise to forbid an association to loan to or discount for its several directors, as they are generally selected from among the leading men in the various branches of business, for the reason that they possess information which is of great value in passing upon paper offered by those engaged in the same line of trade with themselves.

These two gentlemen, therefore, have substantially recommended the provisions of this bill.

It has been asserted by members upon this floor that you can not prevent stealing by whatever safeguards you may throw around these institutions.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the persons who are

I desire to call attention to the fact that the persons who are elected presidents and cashiers of banks are persons who do not belong to the criminal classes. They are persons who at the time of their election occupy high positions and enjoy good reputations for honesty and integrity.

And in every case of a bank failure, it will be found that where the dereliction occurred through borrowing on the part of the president or officers of the bank, that the borrowing began by the taking of small amounts which were invested in speculative enterprises, under the supposition at the time that the loans would terprises, under the supposition at the time that the loans would be returned to the bank, and that they were safe ones.

Such a venture proved unprofitable, and they had to borrow again and again until they had loaded the bank down with paper that was worthless. Now, if this bill had been in operation when the Maverick Bank was organized, and when the bank in Cincinnati known as Harper's Bank failed, or when the bank at Indianapolis recently failed, and the bank at Philadelphia, where the officers had operated largely on the funds of the bank, there would have been no failure in those cases—

Mr. BAILEY. And if you enforce the present laws, there would be norm.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, there would; for the reason that these transactions of the officers would have been reported to the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Comptroller of the Currency would have caused an investigation to be made, which rency would have caused an investigation to be made, which would have begun at a time before the case was hopeless, while the bank was still solvent, and while the loans could have been at least partially made good. But having been concealed, as they are permitted to be under the present law (notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Texas), from the Compressing with the investigation of those accounts, these persons went on from bad to worse, until inevitable calamity overtook them. These restrictions are not imposed for the purpose of conversing these now engaged in banking, but in the interests oppressing those now engaged in banking, but in the interests of the banks and the depositors in national banks.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the supervision of national banks, under the laws which have been passed by Congress to secure supervision, being so much more stringent than the laws governing State banks and banking or ganizations under the laws of the several States, the percentage of failures of national banks is much less than of banks organized under the laws of the States. This fact is attributable to the severe investigations to the better supervision to the better supervision. verer investigations, to the better supervision, to the better provisions of law throwing restrictions around the officers of the national banks than are found in the laws of the States in regard to the officers of those State banks. If time permitted, I could point out from statistics furnished by the Comptrollers of the Currency numerous instances showing that the percentage of loss was vastly less under the national banking system than in the banks of discount under the State laws

Now, some gentlemen have complained that this bill will embarrass the operations of the banks. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has stated that large transactions are immediately done in the banks, and that they can not call the board together. In all such cases as that the board of finance, or the discount board could always be on hard to writing. board together. In all such cases as that the board of finance, or the discount board, could always be on hand to anticipate this, and it need not consist of more than three persons. It is no hardship, when hundreds of thousands of dollars in contracts are to be made, for this committee, the trustees, to be there to see that the proper security is put up. You propose to leave that to the president himself, who may lend money to himself, and we see that the proper security is put up. and we say they should have a committee on discounts to see whether the security he offers is sufficient.

All that this bill requires is that he should submit that to somebody else; that a committee of the board of directors should pass upon it; that the fact should be entered upon the record of the board of directors at the next meeting, and that the fact disclosed by that statement should be returned to the Comptroller of the Currency, so that he could have knowledge of it, and it there was any wrong done by the officers of the bank the Comptroller could call a halt before it was too late.

I do not believe that persons interested in the national banking business have offered any opposition to this bill. It passed this House in the last Congress. I have received no letter from any banking institution objecting to one line of it, and I do not know that any member of the committee has. It has been pending in this House for two or three weeks. It was known to the whole country that such a bill was pending, and no national bank has protested against its passage. I believe they desire its passage. It is in the interest of the stockholders and other persons interested, those who must be heavy losers in case of any loss, interested, those who must be neavy losers in case of any loss, because they not only lose their own capital which they have put in as stock, but as much more for which they are liable. They are interested in having the bank honestly managed, and they are interested in and desire that every safeguard of legislation should be thrown around their interests.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the previous question is ordered now on the bill and pending amendments. The Clerk will report the first amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "quorum," in line 12, insert:
"And then not in excess of the amount now allowed by law."

The amendment was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. There is a substitute pending, which the Clerk will now report.

Abill (H. R. 2344) for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks.

Be it enacted, etc., That no national banking association shall make any loan to its president, its vice-president, its cashier, directors, or any of its clerks, teliers, bookkeepers, agents, servants, or other persons in its employ until the proposition to make such a loan, stating the amount, terms, and security offered therefor shall have been submitted in writing by the person desiring the same to a meeting of the board of directors of such banking association, or of the executive committee of such board, if any, and accepted and approved by a majority of those present constituting a quorum, and then not in excess of the amount now allowed by law. At such meeting the person making such application shall not be present. The said acceptance and approval shall be made by a resolution, which resolution shall be voted upon by all present at such meeting, answering to their names as called, and a record of such vote shall be kept and state separately the names of all the persons voting in favor of such resolution, and of all persons voting against the same, and how each of such persons voted in case such proposition shall be submitted to the executive committee, the resolution and its vote thereon shall be read at the next meeting of the board of directors and entered at length in the minutes of such directors' meeting. No such association shall permit its president, its vice-president, its vice-president, its cashier, or any of its directors, or any of its directors and entered at length in the minutes of such directors' meeting. No such association shall permit its president, its vice-president, or agent of any such association who knowingly violates section one of this set, or who aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any such violation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not more

PRINTING BILL.

The House is in Committee of the Whole The CHAIRMAN. for the consideration of business on the Union Calendar. Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, section 55. line 9, instead of "six" insert "seven;" so as to read, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two copies," etc.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment increases the usual number printed of these documents to The amendment was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR]. The object of the gentleman is that these extra hundred copies may go to the Clerk's document room, and if that document room is to be retained these copies will be re-

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. My understanding is, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman in charge of the bill is willing that this amendment shall be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 55, line 17, and also in same section, line 22, each, after the word "copies" insert "to each designated depository and State and Territorial library, one copy."

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to provide that State libraries and libraries not designated as depositories of public documents may have copies of these documents in the first instance that they may not have to wait until the documents are bound, as they prefer to take them and bind them themselves rather than to wait until they become practically useless. The demand for this provision is made by substantially all the State libraries and large public libraries throughout the country, and I trust the Chairman of the Committee on Printing will make no objection to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, 1 hope very much that this amendment will not be adopted. I wish discuss it for a moment. This amendment was first suggested by a librarian in the State of Indiana. Mr. WEADOCK. The suggestion comes to me from Michi-

Mr. WEADOCK. The suggestion comes to me from Michigan, from several librarians.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The suggestion to the gentleman may come from Michigan, but originally it comes from Indiana. In other words, it is a machine-made amendment. I hold in my hand several letters from New York, Texas, and other States, all stereotyped, sent out on the suggestion of one librarian in the State of Indiana, who, I understand, is a very estima-Of course that does not detract from the merit of the suggestion, but I am satisfied that this amendment is unnecessary. It provides for an increase of 500 copies of each report and document printed by Congress. Now, what is the object of this increase? It is to give to each public library an unbound copy of each one of these documents and reports. The law already gives them bound copies, but this proposes to give them also unbound copies. I do not think that is necessary. There is some ground for the complaint that they do not get the bound copies as promptly as they ought to get them, but if this bill passes they will find that they will get the bound copies as soon as they are ordered bound by Congress. Thus the difficulty now complained of, that these libraries get these documents a year or two after they are writted.

after they are printed, will be obviated.

Mr. WEADOCK. They would be glad to get the unbound copies and bear the expense of binding them, rather than wait so long for the bound copies

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand the complaint which the gentleman makes; and it has been well founded heretofors. The Printing Office has been one or two years behind in printing the reserve copies. But if this bill passes, that difficulty will be removed. Heretofore the Printing Office has been unable to print the reserve, because there was no provision for the prompt preparation of the index. This bill provides a system of indexing and cataloguing which will enable the Public Printer to furnish this reserve without delay, because the regular number and the reserve will be printed at the same time. At present this is not done, and hence the delay. Under the system Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker. I move that ber" will be printed at once, instead of being held back as now.

Mr. PICKLER. How would it be possible to obtain these books as soon as they are published? Can the Printing Office do the work?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. PICKLER. Why do they not do it now?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am stating the reason why this reserve has been held back. Under the system of indexing heretofore prevailing these volumes have been held back until the close of Congress, awaiting the preparation of the index. This bill provides a system by which the indexing can be expedited, so that all the copies can be printed at one time.

It has been stated that the librarians would prefer to receive their copies unbound. I am perfectly willing there shall be inserted in the bill a provision allowing them the privilege of taking the unbound copies and binding them themselves, if they wish to do so.

Mr. WEADOCK. That will be satisfactory.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Iam perfectly willing they shall exercise their discretion in that way. Let them signify to the Public Printer at the beginning of a session, or before it begins, whether the copies are desired bound or unbound.
Mr. WEADOCK. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. WEADOCK. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, bound copies can be purchased under this bill at cost price.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Precisely; anyone can obtain them in that way. If the gentleman from Michigan will modify his amendment so as to give these librarians the option of taking these copies bound or unbound, there will be no objection. But 1 do insist that we ought not to give them the documents in both forms. This is no small item—

Mr. PICKLER. Has the gentleman made any estimate as to the cost of furnishing these libraries extra copies bound?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have an estimate from the Public Printer, in which he states that if this amendment which has been circulated among members—an amendment coming, as I understand, from these different librarians—be adopted it will cost just $37,500 additional. Now, I say this is too much to add to the cost of our printing in order to give these libraries to add to the cost of our printing in order to give these libraries two copies of the same document.

Mr. WEADOCK. We do not want to supply each library with two copies; and it certainly will cost less to furnish unbound copies than bound copies.

Mr. EVERETT. If the amendment suggested should be adopted would there not be some saving in the cost of binding?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There would be, unquestionably.

Mr. EVERETT. Will the chairman of the Printing Committee [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] pledge himself (if I may so say) that these librarians shall receive their unbound copies as soon as other people receive theirs?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] has prepared an amendment covering the point suggested by my friend from Mussachusetts [Mr. EVER-ETT]; and that amendment I will not object to.

I desire now to complete my statement with regard to this mat-ter. In the Fifty-first Congress (I am sorry I have not the statistics of the Fifty-second Congress) there were printed of House reports 4 0.8 of House 4,058, of House executive documents 764, and of House reports 4,058, of House executive documents 764, and of House miscellaneous documents 398, making 5,220 of reports and documents. In the Senate there were printed 2,624 reports, 314 executive documents, and 349 miscellaneous documents, making 3,287 reports and documents for the Senate, and making the aggregate for both Houses 8,507.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I was going to say in reply, if the gentleman will permit me, that if we carry the amendment it will effect the publication of a very much larger number of copies. He will see by an examination that it is an enormous amount of increase.

But I understand the gentleman from Michigan has modified his amendment, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will send to the desk the modified amendment, withdrawing the first one I offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 55, line 17, and also in the same section, line 22, after the word

In section as the fr, and the control of the first the first to the Public Printer before the beginning of Congress whether they wish a bound or unbound copy."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to that amendment and I think there will be none to it generally.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to obtain some information with regard to this question from some member of this committee. My purpose is to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and by receiving the information doubtless other members will be furnished with it at the same time. We all know what "State and Territorial libraries" are without asking, but we may not have a very clear conception as to what is meant by the term "designated depositories." I wish then to know of the gentleman in charge of the bill, or some other gentleman, who and what libraries, and how many, are designated libraries or depositories, and by what authority they have been so designated; also whether they are equally distributed among the States?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They are equally distributed, because each depository is designated by the member of Congress or by law. You have a right to name a depository or depositories in your district. That is a right which all of the members have

Mr. COFFEEN. Then, may each member as he comes to Congress designate new depositories, or is he bound by the old list? May he, in other words, add new ones to the old list, or change the list? If so, how is it limited as to number?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Each member of Congress, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me to answer the question, receives at the beginning of each session of Congress, if not more frequently, a notice from the Secretary of the Interior—Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. From the superintendent of documents in the Interior Department.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana (continuing). Well, through the Secretary of the Interior. He receives a blank, which he has to fill out, in which he specifies the names of the public libraries to which the documents may be sent, and they are then called designated depositories; that is to say, they are designated by the member of Congress.

Mr. COFFEEN. This is getting at the point I desire. But let me ask further: Is there any limit as to how many depositories may be designated, and if so, how is the limitation fixed?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. My understanding is that there are ten in each district.

m in each district.

Mr. COFFEEN. In each Congressional district?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. That is my recollection.

Mr. COFFEEN. That is satisfactory, and I shall support the

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let us have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment of Mr. WEADOCK was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 55, paragraph 1, in line 15, insert "to the Clerk's document room.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is in line with the amendment already agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr.COOPER of Indiana. I have an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I offer another amendment, which is also in line with the amendments previously agreed to.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In paragraph 2, line 22, insert "to the Clerk's document room, 20 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. The amendment was read, as follows:

In paragraph 2, page 20, in line 24, in place of the words "one thousand and eighty-two" insert "one thousand four hundred and forty-two."

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. That is in line with the amendment already offered, and is necessary on account of the increased number.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by sections, read as follows:

SEC. 56. There shall be printed of each Senate and House public bill and joint, concurrent, and simple resolution 625 copies, which shall be distributed as follows: To Senate document room, 225 copies; office of Secretary of Senate, 15 copies; House document room, 385 copies. There shall be printed of each Senate and House private bill 250 copies, which shall be distributed as follows: To Senate document room, 135 copies; to Secretary of Senate, 15 copies; House document room, 160 copies. The term private bill shall be construed to mean all bills for the relief of private parties, bills granting pensions, and bills removing political disabilities. All bills and resolutions shall be printed in bill form, and unless specially ordered by either House shall only be printed when referred to a committee, when reported back, and after their passage by either House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I offer another amendment, which mend to the Clerk's desk. That amendment is also in line with I send to the Clerk's desk. those previously agreed to.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 56, line 3, insert "fifty" in place of "twenty-five." In line 6 insert "to the Clerk's document room, 25 copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

TAYLOR of Indiana. I have another amendment in the same line.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8 insert "sixty-five" in place of "fifty." In line 11 insert "to the Clerk's document room, 15 copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 56 by inserting, after the words "eighty-five copies," the following:

"And the Public Printer shall print such additional number of copies of each Senate and House public bill, joint, concurrent, and simple resolution as will enable him to send I copy of each to each State and Territorial library, and to each depository of public documents, which shall notify him prior to the convening of each Congress of its desire to receive them."

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in support of that amendment I desire to say that I have been appealed to a number of times by persons having charge of libraries in different parts of the country to see if a provision could not be inserted in this bill by the aid of which libraries could be supplied with what we might designate current bills or current public litera-

The colleges are now engaged quite extensively in teaching political science in connection with current political history. Those having charge of those classes of political science have written me frequently, and I have been advised that they have appealed to other members of the House, to be supplied with pending public bills in order that they may intelligently discuss the merits of such measures before the classes of students they are teaching. This amondment was suggested to me by a professor of political science in the Indiana University. It is useless to supply these bills a year or two after they have passed. They will then be a matter of history, and if they are to be of any benefit to these libraries and students of political science any benefit to these libraries and students of political science from current history, they should have them at once, and should not be compelled to rely on members of Congress for such supply. It is well known that members of Congress are quite willing when these appeals are made to them to furnish this material, it should not be necessary to make an appeal to them. The supply should be made direct from the Public Printer to these llbraries, in order that they may be had for use, and it should not be necessary for them to write to members to procure them under the methods now in vogue.

I offer this amendment in good faith, not for the purpose of weakening or detracting from the provisions of the bill, and those with whom I have corresponded are anxious that this bill should pass substantially as it now stands; that it shall not be at all crippled in such a way as to defeat the bill; but this is one of the measures which they insist is important and should be in-corporated in the bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Do I understand the gentleman to say that bills that are enacted into law shall be sent to these liaries, or pending bills?
Mr. COOPER of Indiana. All bills, as they come from the printer; every bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. You mean that every bill introduced shall be sent to these libraries.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. The resolution provides that.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I did not hear it read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that my friend is in sympathy with this bill generally, but I think that it would be a mistake to adopt the amendment. It provides that every bill introduced into either House of Congress of a public character shall be sent to these public libraries or designated depositories. That will increase enormously the expense of printing these bills. If my friend would provide in his amendment simply for bills reported favorably to the two Houses, there might be some merit in it; but the idea of sending a copy of every public bill introduced is very objectionable, and I think unnecessary.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. How many bills are there introduced on an average in each Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can give the gentleman that information.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. And how many of them are enacted

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can give him that also. Looking at page 52 of this celebrated report, that contains everything that is worth knowing, I find that there were introduced in the House in the Fifty-first Congress, bills of all character, 14,350; in the Senate, 5,393; making 19,623 bills introduced. (I have not got the number of bills introduced in the last Congress.) I have not got the number of public bills introduced in the last Congress.) duced in the Fifty-first Congress, but there were about 5,000 or 6,000 public bills

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.
Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Is not by far the greater number of those private bills?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have just said that there were about 5,000 or 6,000 public bills. Now, of all these public bills introduced in the Fifty-first Congress, 611 bills became laws, and 1,579 private bills, making 2,190 private and public bills out of 19,623; or a little over 9 per cent of those introduced became laws.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. And to send all of these bills to these libraries would be furnishing them with useless rubbish of just how many bills?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It would be the difference between 20,000 and 2,000, and would be just so much waste paper between 20,000 and 2,000, and would be just so much waste paper. that would not be worth anything except to throw in the wastepaper baskets.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these public libraries can get these bills whenever they want them. All they have to do is to address a postal card to a member of Congress and he will be ready and eager to reply, as he can, without money and without cost, frank one of these bills to whoever asks for it. You can always get one of these offis to whoever asks for it. You can always get them, for they are carried out in cartloads, and it seems to me that the amendment ought not to be agreed to. And, furthermore, whenever any of these original bills are of great public interest there is always a resolution or order in one House or the other to print extra copies, and that is the way that the extra demand is always met. I insist, therefore, that this amendment ought not to be agreed to. And now I desire permission to have

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent for an extension of time to have this letter read, because it is from the president of the American Library Association, and the object I have in having it read is to show that while these little libraries, and I mean that in no disrespect-these State and county libraries—have sent this vast number of publications here, machine made, when the American Library Association, through its president, Mr. Larned, has, in this letter addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Printing, stated that the libraries of the United States are content with this bill as it is.

I ask to have the letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUFFALO, N. Y., September 22, 1893.

BUFFALO, N. Y., September 22, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I write, on behalf of the American Library Association, to express its urgent desire for favorable action in Congress on the bill now pending which relates to the printing and distribution of public documents.

It may be fairly claimed that the public libraries of the country represent in this matter the public interest. It is only through the agency of the libraries that the public interest. It is only through the agency of the libraries that the public ations of the Government can reach the greater number of the people to whom they will be beneficial. Their distribution through other agencies is necessarily limited in comparison.

Not many persons can have had so much experience of the defects of the present system under which public documents are printed and distributed as those who are in charge of the public libraries. Not many can have had either occasion or opportunity to consider so carefully the changes that are needed in it, for the purpose of realizing the utmost usefulness of the valuable printed records and publications of the Government. At their yearly national meetings they have discussed the question again and again in all its bearings, and, while all they would recommend is not embraced in the bill now before Congress. I can safely say that they are of one mind as to the urgent need of its passage. I submit to you, for them, their petition to that effect, and it is equally the petition of the great public whom they serve. We pray for the adoption of the bill without amendments that will change its essential provisions, and especially for those parts of it which provide for the cataloguing and indexing of public documents, and for their distribution to public libraries.

The subject has an importance to the country that grows greater every year, and its treatment by proper legislation has already been deferred too long.

long. Respectfully,

J. N. LARNED.
President American Library Association.

Hon. J. D. RICHARDSON, Chairman of Committee on Printing.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I concur in every word of that letter, and I would not by any act of mine delay for a moment the passage of this bill. Many of its features are exa moment the passage of this oill. Many of its features are excellent and necessary, and I think it ought to pass. But there is nothing in that letter adverse to the suggestion made by me, and I doubt not that if the attention of the writer was called to my suggestion he would concur in it. My friend from Tennessee who has this bill in charge objects to these circular letters sent out from the various libraries, recommending this amountment. out from the various libraries recommending this amendment, and says that they are "machine made."

and says that they are "machine made."

It is true, sir, that the State librarian of the State of Indiana has called general attention to the subject; but librarians are not persons who would be likely to sign statements, or recommendations, or petitions addressed to members of Congress without knowing their contents; and the fact that so many librarians have island in this recommendation. I have before me at least but knowing their contents; and the fact that so many librarians have joined in this recommendation—I have before me at least a dozen from different parts of the country—ought to weigh very strongly in favor of the amendment. It is true that these recommendations are all in the same language, but they are all intelligently directed to the point, and they express the uniform view that this bill should be amended in this particular.

Now, a word in reference to the suggestion which has been view that this bill should be amended in this particular.

Now, a word in reference to the suggestion which has been made as to the possibility of the libraries getting these documents through members of Congress. Many of these libraries and depositories are in the principal cities of the country where important newspapers are edited and printed, able newspapers, papers which formulate public opinion, and which, in the end, make law. If the public is to rely, as it must rely, upon the newspapers for its information concerning pending measures, then it will not do to ask the newspaper editor to wait until he then it will not do to ask the newspaper editor to wait until he can correspond with his member of Congress, and until he can get copies of bills by the slow process of correspondence through

A bill may have passed the House, it may be a pernicious measure, it may be that if attention had been called to those objectionable features it could not have passed the House. Now, if that bill could be delivered at once from the hands of the printer to the public libraries, where the properties of the problem. to the public libraries, where the newspapers could have access to it, very possibly great good might result. One of the complaints of the existing state of things comes to me from the editor of a very able newspaper, himself an ex-librarian, and his views are in line with the suggestions which I have just through our or a very able newspaper, filmself an ex-librarian, and his views are in line with the suggestions which I have just thrown out. If these bills are worth printing, if the object is to give the public a knowledge of the proceedings of Congress, then they should be disposed of in such a way as to reach the public promptly.

Complaint is made, Mr. Chairman, that public documents are Complaint is made, Mr. Chairman, that public documents are rotting away in the cellars and warehouses of the Government. We have no difficulty in getting documents printed, we have considerable difficulty in finding room to store them. This amendment looks toward the distribution of these documents the country toward putting them into the hands of throughout the country, toward putting them into the hands of the people, where they may be instructive and useful, and it seems to me that it is a matter in which the public are largely inter-ested. It should be remembered also that my amendment provides that these bills and documents shall be sent only to those depositories and public libraries which express a desire to have

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WARNER was read, as follows:

After the words "each" insert "bill favorably reported to the House, with the report thereon."

with the report thereon."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, the want that has been described by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cooper] is a genuine one and a constantly increasing one. The suggestion that it can be met by permitting persons in any part of the country desiring these documents—editors, scholars, public men engaged in discussion—to write to their Congressmen to send them copies of discussion—to write to their Congressmen to send them copies of such bills as they have seen described in the newspapers is a suggestion which is practically of no value at all. When a man wants a copy of a certain bill he wants it at the time that want converted him; and what is more any one copyed in the diswants a copy of a certain bill he wants it at the time that want occurs to him; and, what is more, any one engaged in the discussion of public questions needs to have upon his desk what bills are being discussed, in order that he may choose from them those to which he desires to pay particular attention.

On the other hand, while the object of the gentleman from Indiana is entirely good. I fear that it would be defeated if the

Indiana is entirely good, I fear that it would be defeated if the provision were inserted in the shape he has proposed, for this provision were inserted in the shape he has proposed, for this reason. If five thousand or ten thousand bills are piled upon the desk of each librarian throughout the country the result will be that no man will be able to find in that mass of rubbish just what he may desire.

If on the other hand we wait until the bills have been sifted by the committees of the Houses and put into a position where they stand some ghost of a chance to be enacted into law, and if then we provide that there shall be forwarded to these depositories copies of the bills favorably reported, together with the reports made upon them, those libraries will receive everything that is of public moment and they will not have what is useful and valuable drowned under an avalanche of matter so great as to keep them from finding what they do want. They will have the bills reported favorably, with the reports for and against them. I therefore move this amendment, which I believe to be not merely conducive to a great saving of expense, but to a still conductive to the efficiency of the means proposed. greater extent conducive to the efficiency of the means proposed greater extent conducive to the emerge of the means proposed for enlightening the public.

Mr. WAUGH. The gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, puts the matter in this way: That each library will receive a copy of every bill that is favorably reported, together with the report of the committee. I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cooper] simply to provide that they should receive copies of all bills introduced. Now I submit to my colleague whether the amendment of the gentleman they should receive copies of all bills introduced. Now I submit to my colleague whether the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] is not much better?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. While I do not agree that my original contention was not the correct one, yet in the hope that I may get something by assenting to this amendment, and fearing that I may not get anything if I do not, I accept the amendment suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Public Printer shall print such additional number of copies of each Senate and House public bill, joint, concurrent and simple resolution, as will enable him to send one copy of each bill favorably reported to either House, with the report thereon, to each State and Territorial library and to each depository of public documents which shall notify him prior to the convening of each Congress of its desire to receive them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am not certain but that the amendment of my friend from New York [Mr. WARNER] may cut out the most important bills introduced here, if you take into consideration the educational effect to be obtained from the church of these documents are all the second than the results of the second control of the second contr take into consideration the educational effect to be obtained from circulating these documents among these libraries. This may sound like a paradoxical proposition, but it is not. Let me state the reason for the remark. It frequently happens that bills introduced here Congress after Congress, are reported upon adversely; but the idea or principle contained in those measures grows in strength year by year, until after awhile a majority report is obtained.

Let me give an illustration. I have introduced at this session a bill to levy an income tax. Bills of similar purport have been introduced here session after session. I have no doubt in the world that the bill introduced by me will be reported upon adversely; but that in the course of time an income tax will be levied in this country is to me no more a matter of doubt than that the sup will rise to moreow.

that the sun will rise to-morrow.

Mr. WAUGH. Would not such a bill with the adverse report upon it go to these libraries under the amendment now pending?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir. My understanding is that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is confined to bills reported favorably.

the amendment of the gentleman from New York is confined to bills reported favorably.

Mr. WAUGH. Yes; I believe the gentleman is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is a good one. I would like to incorporate his idea in my amendment; and if further difference of opinion on this question can be obviated in that way, I am willing that the word "favorable," be struck out and that all bills reported be circulated as provided in the amendment.

bills reported be circulated as provided in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was about to give another illustration of the proposition I had laid down. Minorities are not tration of the proposition I had laid down. Minorities are not always in the wrong by a great deal.

A MEMBER. "Not by a large majority." [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me give an illustration on that point, which every lawyer in Missouri knows to be true. Twenty years ago Thomas A. Sherwood was elected one of the judges of the supreme court of Missouri. During his occupancy of that position he has rendered more dissenting opinions than any other man who has ever sat upon that bench the same length of time; and he has lived to see a majority of the dissenting opintime; and he has lived to see a majority of the dissenting opinions he has rendered become the majority of the dissenting opinions he has rendered become the majority opinions of that court, with the approval of the lawyers and the people of the State. So, there are plenty of bills introduced here which, at the time of their introduction, may not have more than one man in favor of them, we they may be right.

of their introduction, may not have more than one man in large of them; yet they may be right.

Mr. WAUGH. I think the gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you give the people a chance to take these bills and digest them and study them, the man who to day is right by himself will some years from now be found to to-day is right by himself, will some years from now be found to be right with the majority at his back.

Here the hammer fell. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to understand how the gentleman from Indiana desires his proposition to be stated. The Chair understood the gentleman to accept—

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. The parliamentary status of the matter is this: I accepted the amendment of the gentleman from New York, not observing at the time that the word "favorable" was included in that amendment. The gentleman, however, was included in that amendment. The gentleman, however, agrees as I do, that the word be struck out, so that the amendment may apply to all bills reported.

Mr. DINGLEY. That brings the matter back precisely where it started, because all bills must be reported back either favorably or adversely. Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. COFFEEN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has brought out a correct point; I had the same thing in my mind. We now come around to the provision that all public bills, whether reported favorably or unfavorably, shall under this provision be sent out; and when we take into consideration the fact that all bills referred to committees should be reported back, we have no advance at all; we are where we started. We are providing for vast expenses in piling on the tables of each designated depository five or six thousand documents at every session, according to the statistics given by the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the majority of bills referred are not reported back at all; they die in committee.

Mr. COFFEEN. I was about saying, Mr. Chairman, that it is contemplated that all bills will be reported back, and I think the committee that does its duty will report them back. That is as I understand the situation.

But I shall oppose the amendment in either case, certainly in the present case. I take this ground, that it is the duty of the Congressman to look after the interests of his district. I take the ground that if he does not do it properly he will be remanded to private life and a better man sent here. That ought to be

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman this ques-

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, that is a practical question. If the supply already printed and remaining in the document room is exhausted, then the argument on that point would be good. But when there is ordinarily a surplus every time we send out for them we need not make provision for printing more, and increase the expense for such a purpose until the usual surplus as now printed is exhausted.

I am inclined to take the view of this matter taken by the chairman of our Printing Committee; and for the additional reason when we remember that it is the two Houses of Congress which these documents, pertaining to Congressional action, are designed primarily to benefit. They are for the benefit and convenience of the members of the House and Senate in the discharge of their duties, and so far as their distribution to the pubconcerned they ought to be distributed through the memhers themselves.

In that way our people can judge of what is going on and what ought to be done, and they can be sent to interested parties, and our Congressmen can be expected to discharge that duty on all important bills, even before the committees report. Again, we have provided already at considerable expense that special galleries and special opportunities shall be afforded for the great public press of the country, which has great privileges accorded to it, so they can observe what is done on this floor. They are not required to await the action of the committees, but, even on the immediate presentation of a bill, they are expected to give the public information. They are anxious to do it, because in serving the public they are serving their own interests. Therefore, I favor the arrangement suggested by the gentleman in charge of the bill, and that this distribution be made through the membership of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. To meet the technical difficulty which has been raised, I ask the gentleman from Indiana to modify his amendment by inserting the words, "all bills reported back, where the reports go on the Calendars of the House." Of course, if they are simply understood to be techni-cally reported, or not reported, they will not be placed on the

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I will accept the suggestion and modify the amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "eighty-five copies," in section 56, insert the following: "And the Public Printer shall print such additional number of copies of each Senate and House public bill, joint, concurrent, and simple resolution as will-enable him to send one copy of each bill reported to either House, and all bills reported back, where the reports go on the Calendar with the reports thereon, to each State and Territorial library," etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like consent to recur to section 55 again. The Clerk read so hastily that a couple of amendments were omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring to the section indicated?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I offer the amendment I send to

The Clerk read as follows:

In paragraph 3, section 55, on page 20, line 29, insert, after the word copies," "to the Clerk's document room, 360 copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I now offer another amendment to paragraph 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paragraph 4, line 35, after the word "copies," insert "Clerk's document room, 360 copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

TAYLOR of Indiana. I now offer an amendment to section 57, line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The section will be read first.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 57. There shall be printed in slip form 1,810 copies of public and 460 of private laws, postal conventions, and treaties, which shall be distributed as follows: To the House document room, 1,000 copies of public and 100 copies of private laws; to the Senate document room, 550 copies of public and 100 copies of private laws; to the Department of State, 200 copies of all laws; and to the Treasury Department, 60 of all laws. Postal conventions and treaties shall be distributed as private laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the section, in line 8, by striking out 2 and inserting 5 in lieu

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], in charge of the bill, before passing from section 56, to insert the word "favorably" after the word "when," in the sixteenth line, so as to read "when favorably reported back." Of course a bill should not be reprinted unless favorably reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think that is desirable.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by sections, read as follows:

read as follows:

SEC. 58. There shall be printed of the Journals of the Senaté and House of Representatives 1,110 copies, which shall be distributed as follows: To the Senate document room, 90 copies for distribution to Senators, and 25 additional copies; to the Senate library, 15 copies; to the House document room, 360 copies for distribution to members, and 25 additional copies; to the Department of State, 10 copies; to the superintendent of documents, 500 copies; to the Library of Congress, 52 copies; to the Court of Claims, 2 copies, and to the ibrary of the House of Representatives, 10 copies. The remaining number of the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, consisting of 21 copies, shall be furnished to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, as the necessities of their respective offices may require, as rapidly as signatures are completed for such distribution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In section 58, line 8, there a provision for 10 copies to be sent to the Department of tate. A letter from the Department of State to the chairman of the committee states that 4 copies will be sufficient. fore move to strike out "ten" and insert "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 58, line 6, strike out the word "House" and insert the word Clerk's" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment adopted a few moments ago, offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER], is inconsistent, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that we recur back to it. I think what he intends to express is not clearly expressed. The amendment I refer to is the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. COOPER]. If I can get unanimous consent to have it read, it will be seen that it provides that each public bill together with the reserved. provides that each public bill, together with the report thereon, shall be sent to the public libraries. It also says that the Public Printer shall print extra copies of each joint and simple resolution, but it does not provide, as I remember it, anything about the sending of the simple or joint resolutions to the libraries.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Bretz] to recur to that amendment for the purpose of correction? There was no objection.

Mr. BRETZ. Now I ask to have the amendment read. The Clerk read as follows:

And the Public Printer shall print such additional number of copies of each Senate and House public bill, joint, concurrent, and simple recolution as will enable him to send I copy of each bill reported to either House that goes upon the Calendar, together with the report thereon, to each State and Territorial library, and to each depository of public documents which shall notify him prior to the convening of each Congress of its desire to receive them.

Mr. BRETZ. Now you will see that it simply provides for the sending of bills and reports. It should also provide for the sending of the resolutions

Mr. WARNER. If you would strike out the word "bill" that would accomplish it.

Mr. BRETZ. I suggest the striking out of the word "bill."

That will perfect the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment'

Mr. BRETZ. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Do I understand that this will include all the resolutions introduced in the House?

Mr. WARNER. Only those that are printed and reported. It does not refer to resolutions of inquiry or resolutions of investigation, which are acted upon in the House without being

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I am opposed to the whole proposition myself. On my brief acquaintance with the House I hesi-tate to indulge in anything like criticism of what is being done; but it strikes me that we are engaged in a very useless expenditure of public money. As I understand, this section provides that every bill that is offered in the House, and that goes upon the Calendar, shall be furnished to State libraries; and the reason given for it, as I understand, is that it may inform the people of the state of the second of t ple what public measures are pending before Congress.

Of course we are all obliged to speak from our own experience, which I am ready to confess is local and oftentimes somewhat restricted; but I undertake to say that you might send as many bills as you please to the public library of my State and they would not be read by half a dozen men.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I do not know just what question is pending, but I desire to state that my amendment expressly provides for cases of this kind, because it declares in to many words that its provisions shall be limited to those libraries and depositories which notify the Public Printer, before each assion of Congress, of their desire to receive these bills and Zeconstants.

only such public libraries and depositories as put on file, be-fore the meeting of Congress, special requests for them, will re-ceive them. Therefore, if the people of the gentleman's district do not desire to be enlightened, if the gentleman does not wish them to have these bills, and if they do not ask for them, they will not be harmed by receiving them, because the documents

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Georgia that there is nothing now before the committee, the proposition having been agreed to.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I understood that when we went back to this section the proposition was open.

The CHAIRMAN. Not as to that proposition. There is no power in Committee of the Whole to reconsider the vote by which power in Committee of the Whole to reconsider the vote by which a proposition is agreed to. The request was to return for the purpose of offering an amendment, and the amendment offered was agreed to, as the Chair understood, without objection. It was simply to strike out the word "bills" from the amendment. But the gentleman from Georgia speaks so rarely in the committee, the Chair is disposed to indulge him to express his views. Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I have no disposition whatever to speak out of order. I understood that the whole proposition was open. I shall take the first opportunity to express myself more at large on the general proposition I have already suggested of what appears to me to be a useless extravagance in this matter of printing.

this matter of printing

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 50. Whenever printing not bearing a Congressional number shall be done for any Department or officer of the Government, except confidential matter, blank forms, and circular letters not of a public character, or shall be done for use of Congressional committees, not of a confidential character, two copies shall be sent, unless withheld by order of the committee, by the Public Printer to the Senate and House Libraries, respectively, and one copy each to the document rooms of the Senate and House, for reference; and these copies shall not be removed; and of all publications of the Executive Departments not intended for their especial use, but made for distribution, 500 copies shall be at once delivered to the superintendent of documents for distribution to designated depositories and State and Territorial libraries.

Mr. WEADOCK and Mr. WAUGH addressed the Chair.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section, and then gentlemen may offer their amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The amendment I offer is to come in at the close of section 59.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows.

The Public Printer may furnish without cost to Senators, Members, and Delegates envelopes ready for mailing the Congressional Record or any part thereof, or speeches or reports therein contained. Envelopes so furnished shall contain in the upper left-hand corner thereof the following words, to wit: "Senate United States (or House of Representatives, U. S.) Part of Congressional Record. Free." And in upper right-hand corner the letters "U. S. S." or "M. C." But he shall not print any other words thereon, except at the personal expense of the Senator, Member, or Delegate ordering, he same.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that there will be no objection to this amendment. It is intended to remedy what I believe, and what the committee thought a great evil. It simply provides for a uniformity in the manila envelope or other wrapper in which we send out speeches manua envelope or other wrapper in which we send out speeches or documents. At present some members of Congress have adopted a method of placing in the left-hand corner other matter where the word "free" now appears; and where this amendment will have printed the words "Public document," or "Part of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," and the word "Free," and "Senate" or "House of Representatives," as the case may be, some members have adopted a form shown upon the envelope which I hold in my hand. I hold in my hand.

seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to get into this, we might fill the whole body of the envelope with extracts from a gentleman's speech, and also print his likeness for that

Mr. BRETZ. I think the gentleman's amendment said something about the return of the document.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will come to that in a moment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to this if a member wishes to have it done and pays for it; but if this work goes on. wishes to have it done and pays for it; but it this work goes on.
and these envelopes are figured or disfigured, as the case may be, they do not fit anybody's else speech or public document; and if not used as printed for him they are simply dumped into the waste, and that is an end of it. Now, we furnish these envelopes free, with the words I have indicated and that I have put into this amendment. It seems to me that is all that ought to be put on them. Then, if a member orders these envelopes for his speech, if he does not use all of them they fit somebody else's speech as well as his own.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if a member of Congress can demand that and have that done at the Public Printing Office at the public expense?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He can not have it done Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He can not have it done at the public expense, in my judgment; but I think in some instances these envelopes have been printed in this way upon the request of an officer either of the Senate or House. We want to stop that. That is the object I had in view; that the officers of the House may not have it done at the public expense upon their request; but if a member of Congress wants it done let him pay for it out of his own private funds.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then there is no provision of law which now permits that, and your amendment prevents it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all.

Further, inreference to the inquiry of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ], the amendment provides for a notice of return of

Mr. Bretz], the amendment provides for a notice of return of the document or matter at whatever time desired. That is sim-ply done at the request of the member. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He might not use them all. If he ordered an edition of 10,000 he might use only 5,000, and there is no law requiring him to use what he has ordered, so and there is no law read many left over, and they would not be of there might be a great many left over, and they would not be of any use. My friend from South Dakota, for instance, would not want to send out my speeches in envelopes with his name on

Mr. PICKLER. That would depend upon what doctrine you presched. [Laughter.] Mr. DINGLEY. Let me suggest another reason. These envelopes are printed in large quantities with the regular form printed upon them; but if the suggestion of the gentleman from South Dakota were adopted, it would be necessary to make up a separate form in each case, which would add greatly to the ex-

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk

The amendment was read, as follows:

Section 59, line 9, strike out all after the word "reference" and insert: "and ne copy to each designated depository and State and Territorial library; he custodian of said library to indicate to the Public Printer before the beinning of Congress whether bound or unbound copies are desired."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suggest to my friend that he wants that to come in after the word "removed" in line 10 and not after the word "reference" in line 9.

Mr. WEADOCK. I accept that suggestion.

The amendment was adopted. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 51. There shall be one document room of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives, to be designated, respectively, the "Senate and House document room." Each shall be in charge of a superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Sergeant-A-Arms of the Senate and the Doorkeeper of the House, respectively, who shall also appoint the necessary number of assistants: Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the the third section of the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 2, insert "two" instead of "one;" line 6, insert "and the Clerk of the

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on reflection, I will withdraw those amendments, and instead will move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the object of this section is to abolish the Clerk's document room of the House; but there seems to be a great deal of opposition to that on the part of some members, and if this section is struck out it will leave us just in the position we are in now. For myself I think that one document room is enough for any one body, but some of our friends seem to prefer it the other way, and I am willing to leave the question to the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing, or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER], or somebody else, where that will leave the whole thing?

leave the whole thing?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Just where it is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you keep the House document room and then keep a Senate document room, what do you want with this new superintendent of documents? Where is he to be?

Where does he stay? And to whom does he belong?

Mr. McMILLIN. I think, with all deference to my friend from Indiana, that my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is correct in advocating this provision of the bill. It abolishes an office that I think we can very well dispense with. The section the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] refers to comes that on where there is a proposition to greate an officer for the later on where there is a proposition to create an officer for the distribution of these documents who, under the old bill, was to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and con-sent of the Senate, but who, under this bill, is to be appointed by the Joint Committee on Printing. I believe that the interests of the public service would be advanced by abolishing this office.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask you a question now.
Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the idea of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR] prevails, and you keep the house document room and the Senate document room, and do not create a superintendent of documents, does not that place this whole bill in a muddle from the beginning to the end? In other words, is not this entire bill predicated upon the idea that you are going to create this office of superintendent of documents?

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill is not predicated on that idea. There are about ten sections, succeeding the next section, which were stricken out of the old bill (which did not become a law in the last Congress), that are bottomed upon the idea that this new officer will be created, but the officer sought to be created by the Committee on Printing is not essential to the system of the bill.

Mr. STALLINGS. That will leave two House document rooms, the Clerk's document room, and the Doorkeeper's document room, and then you propose to make another?

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not intend to anticipate the sections in advance at all, but I think the correct idea is to abolish the Clerk's document room as proposed by my colleague [Mr. Richardson]. I go with him that far, but there I part company with him, for I would not create the superintendent for the distribution of documents that his bill proposes. We should still have the House document room and the Senate document room as we have now, and we should be minus the Clerk's document room, the duties of which can be discharged by somebody else.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I can not understand why the Doorkeeper of this House should be the custodian of documents. In the Senate the Secretary is the custodian of the documents of that body. Why should the Doorkeeper act in that capacity that body. Why should the Doorkeeper act in that capacity here? Why should these duties be taken away from the Clerk? In the various State Legislatures the duties of the doorkeeper are analogous to those performed by a sheriff in connection with a court. The sheriff has no custody of the documents of the court. Why should the Doorkeeper of this body have custody of documents properly belonging to the Clerk? For my part, which is the court of t of documents properly belonging to the Clerk? For my part, I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin] that one document room for the House might answer; but that should certainly be the Clerk's document room. The Clerk, not the Doorkeeper, should be the custodian of our documents. As I understand, the Clerk's document room of the House has had the care of House documents from the time the Capitol was partially destroyed by English troops; and documents from that time down are on file in his department—documents which are exceedingly valuable.

The entire line of those documents, running down from that time to the present, is under his control. Why the duties of the Clerk in this respect should now be abolished and this matter be put in the hands of an officer occupying a position corresponding to that of sheriff is beyond my comprehension.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana to strike out the section, there were -ayes 19, noes 19.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. RICHARDSON] to this matter: I observe in line 8, of section 61, this language, "This section shall not take effect until the closing of the Fifty-second Congress."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is a misprint. It should be the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to amend, so as to correct the error, by striking out "Fifty-second" and inserting "Fifty-third."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I move to amend by striking out the word "House" in line 3 of this section and inserting the word "Clerk's," so as to read, "the Senate and Clerk's document

Mr. DINGLEY. That is precisely the same proposition just defeated, although parliamentarily in another form.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 16, noes 21.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I call for tellers.
Tellers were not ordered, only 8 voting in favor thereof.
So the amendment was rejected.

SEC. 62. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a clerk to said joint committee, who shall be superintendent of documents, and be entitled to receive a salary of $2.500 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution, excepting those printed for the special official use of the Executive Departments, which shall be delivered to said Departments, and those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which shall be delivered to the folding rooms of said Houses and distributed or delivered ready for distribution to Members and Delegates upon their order by the superintendents of the folding rooms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. FITHIAN. I move to amend by striking out this section, and I ask that the same motion apply to the following sections down to and including section 73. These are the sections which were stricken out of this bill in the last Congress. The matter was then fully discussed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As the gentleman from Illinois has stated, certain sections were stricken out of the bill on this subject in the last Congress; but this bill is not identical with the bill of the last Congress; and consequently his enumeration of sections does not properly apply to this bill. I have carefully noted the sections of this bill which should be struck out if the House desires not to create the new office here proposed. I ask the gentleman to modify his motion so as to cover the sections which I will indicate.

Mr. FITHIAN. What are they?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Sections 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, and 69. Those are the sections covering the new clerk provided for in this bill,

Is that the only new office created by the bill? A MEMBER. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is the only new office; and the bill abolishes several offices.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fith-IAN] that all the sections embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Illinois might be read and go into the RECORD, so that we can see exactly what they embrace.

Mr. FITHIAN. And then let the matter go over for to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose so, as it is now nearly the usual time for adjournment, but on that matter I express no opinion. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] will please indicate the sections he moves to strike out.

Mr. FITHIAN. I desire to strike out section 62 and the following sections down to section 73, inclusive. I ask that these sections be read and that the vote on the proposition be passed over until we resume the consideration of the bill on another

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Illinois has moved, as I understand, to strike out sections 62 to 73, inclusive. I make the point of order that a motion can not be made to strike out

Mr. FITHIAN. I have moved to strike out only section 62. have asked consent that the motion be allowed to apply to these other sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. Section 62 was read, after which the gentleman from Illinois moved to strike out that section; and then he asked unanimous consent that the succeeding sections down to and including section 73 be included in his motion.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But he asks that the sections be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; but if consent is given to allow the motion to strike out to apply to the sections named, they will be read, all of them.

Mr. FITHIAN. It is now about the time of adjournment, Mr. Chairman, and I ask that the sections be read and that they go into the RECORD, and this matter go over until the committee takes up this bill again on some other day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tenuessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my request. I have carefully noted the sections applying to this new office, and they are the sections I have already named. If the gentleman from Illinois will confine his request to striking out these sections, I think that amendment may be pending without objection.

Mr. FITHIAN. If the gentleman is quite sure that he has examined carefully and finds that these other sections do not apply, then I will consent to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Just the same motion was made, let me state, in the last Congress when this bill was up for consideration. It was on the motion of the gentleman from for consideration. It was on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, as my colleague [Mr. McMillin] will remember, and I was called on to state the sections of the bill which referred to this new officer. I stated them hurriedly, and without a careful examination of them at the moment, and some sections were stricken out, under a misapprehension, that ought not to have been stricken out. It was in the hurry of the moment that the statement was made on which they went out of the bill. But now, after a careful examination of the sections, I have enumerated here the ones that relate to the new office.

Mr. McMILLIN. But all the sections the gentleman from Illinois indicated were stricken out before.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly, but on my own suggestion, made inadvertently.

Mr. McMILLIN. But I think my colleague will find that they all pertained to this officer or to this office.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want this to go into the RECORD, for I am speaking now "by the card," so to speak.

The words "superintendent of documents" are enumerated in all of the sections. But we have a superintendent of documents already, and have had one for many years. Now, it is not necessary to strike out all the sections in the bill because each happens to contain the words "superintendent of documents," because that superintendent of documents referred to there is the one now in existence, already provided for by existing law.

Mr. McMILLIN. But may you not give him new powers in

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Ah! Then my colleague does not want to strike him out, but to strike out the new powers. Now, if my colleague does not get too hurried, I will explain this so that there will be do difficulty about it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not hurried at all. We have all the day before us

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to show that the gentleman will find on examination that these paragraphs do not give any new powers at all objectionable.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the sections be read or printed in the RECORD, and the matter may go over until this subject is resumed by the committee some other day

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I call for the regular order.
The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the amendment of The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the at the gentleman from Illinois to strike out section 62.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on his amendment? Mr. FITHIAN. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only wished to say-Mr. FITHIAN. I understand the gentleman was not objecting to the section being stricken out.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will not if the gentleman

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will not if the gentleman takes the sections I have indicated. But he refused to do that. Mr. FITHIAN. No, the gentleman misunderstands me. I said I would consent if you were satisfied you were correct. But I asked that the matter be printed in the RECORD, and go over until the next day when the bill is taken up.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to that, but wished to get into the RECORD the facts I have stated.

Now, before concluding, and before making a motion which I shall in a few minutes make, I wish to state that the sections I mentioned alone relate to this new clerk that is provided for in I mentioned alone relate to this new cierk that is provided for in section 62. The remaining sections, some of them, relate to the office of the superintendent of documents. Now, if the sections indicated are stricken out, I have prepared three or four sections, which I have in my hand, to substitute for them. If these sections are stricken out, all that are enumerated by my friend from Illinois, it will leave no provision in this bill for the distribution of the surplus documents in the basement of the Capital and it the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and in the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and in the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and in the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and the house was and Downstreament of the Capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the capital and the house was a provinced to the house tol and in the bureaus and Departments of the Government.

Now, if you strike out all of these sections, there will be no provision in his bill for their distribution, which is very earnestly desired by every new member of this House, certainly, and by old members as well.

Now, I have selected the sections which ought to go out, if you do not want this distribution as provided for in the bill, and if you will strike them out, and then take the new sections which I have carefully prepared as a substitute for them, there will be a method for the immediate distribution of these surplus documents, so much desired by all of us.

In other words, if my friend will indulge me for a moment, I have tried, in preparing the new sections, to fit them honestly to the new or changed condition of the bill as it will exist after this new officer is refused by the House, if he is refused.

Mr. FITHIAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will suggest that he let the sections that I have moved to strike out be printed in the Record, together with his substitute, and let the whole matter go over until the next legislative day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will not object to that, I see no particular reason for printing the sections in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] demanded the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If I may be indulged for a moment, these sections which it is proposed to strike out, are than they will appear in if printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FITHIAN. The substitute is not printed, however.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will have that printed, if it is desired. Mr. FITHIAN.

Mr. FITHIAN. Then let it be printed.
Mr. McMILLIN. And I submit that when these sections are reached they will go in the RECORD anyway, and they might as well go in now as later, because that will give us an opportunity to see them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to that. Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a very important matter, which ought not to be considered so hastily as it would necessarily have to be if the vote was taken at this time. I therefore move that the committee do now rise. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let us first get these things printed. Withdraw your motion for a moment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I will withdraw it for a moment.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the sections indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] be printed, and immediately following them the proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentlemen again indicate the the sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] asks to strike out sections 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, and 73. Let those sections be printed in the RECORD. Then I ask, in addition to that, that there be printed in the RECORD the sections which, if they are stricken out, I shall offer as a substitute for those sections, which substitute provides for the distribution of these surplus documents by our own officers, by our Doorkeeper and the Secretary of the Senting of the ate, just as we now distribute documents. It does not provide for their distribution by the superintendent of documents in the Interior Department at all, or by any new officer, but by our own officers, under the old method.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee Mr. Rich-ARDSON] asks unanimous consent that sections 62 to 73, inclusive, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

here was no objection.

The sections referred to are as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] also asks that certain substitute sections which he states he will offer if these sections are stricken out, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

The sections referred to by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee are as follows:

are as follows:

In place of section 64 substitute the following:

"SEC. 64. The superintendent of documents is hereby authorized to sell at cost any public document in his charge, the distribution of which is not herein specifically directed, said cost to be estimated by the Public Printer and based upon printing from sterectyped plates; but only one copy of any document shall be soid to the same person, excepting libraries or schools by which additional copies are desired for separate departments thereof; and whenever any officer of the Government having in his charge documents published for sale shall desire to be relieved of the same, he is hereby authorized to turn them over to the superintendent of documents, who shall receive and sell them under the provisions of this section. All moneys received from the sale of documents shall be covered into the Treasury quarterly and placed to the credit of the general fund for public printing, and the superintendent of documents shall report annually the number of copies of each and every document sold by him, and the price of the same. He shall also report annually the number of documents made of the same."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This section is important, as it affords opportunity to secure documents on the part of those who prefer to buy rather than beg. It also encourages the sale of documents, and in its results will go far toward defraying the expenses of the office of the superintendent of docu-

Amend section 65 by striking out all after the word "character," in line 12.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The comprehensive index provided for in this section will include all Congressional documents. Furthermore, the superintendent of documents will not be under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

This is one of the important sections of the entire bill, and should by all means be retained. The index for which it provides is almost an imperative necessity, if public documents are to serve in largest measure the purpose for which they are printed. The librarians of the country are unanimous in their appeal for such an index.

Also—
Strike out section 70 and substitute in its place three sections, as follows (sections 68, 69, 70):
"SEC. 68. The Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall cause an invoice to be made of all public documents stored in and about the Capitol, other than those belonging to the quota of me bers of the present Congress, to the Library of Congress and the Senate and House libraries, and all such documents shall by the superintendents, respectively, of the Senate and House folding rooms be just to the credit of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the present Congress, in quantities equal in the number of volumes and as nearly as possible in value, to each member of Congress, and said documents shall be distributed upon the orders of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, each of whom shall be supplied by the superintendents of the folding rooms with a list of the number and character of the publications thus put to his credit: Provided, That before said apportionment is made copies of any of these documents desired for the use of committees: the Senate or House shall be delivered to the chairmen of such committees: And provided further. That four copies of each and all leather-bound documents shall be reserved and carefully stored, to be used hereafter in supplying deliciencies in the Senate and House libraries caused by wear or loss.

"SEC. 69. All documents at present remaining in charge of the several Executive Departments, bureaus, and offices of the Government not required for official use shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents, and effect all public documents accumulating in said Departments, bureaus, and offices not needed for official use shall be annually turned ever to the superintendent of documents for distribution or sale.

"SEC. 70. Where, in the division among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of extra copies of documents printed for the use of Congress, there shall be a remainder beyond the number of 25 to each House of Congress, the surprintendent of documents for distribution and sale by him under the provisions of this law. All documents delivered to the superintendent of documents from accumulations thereof in the Executive Departments, or received from officers of the two Houses, shall be distributed by him, first to public and school libraries for the purpose of completing broken sets; second, to public and school libraries that have not been superintendents of the such sets; and third, to other parties, which persons and libraries shall be named to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress; and in this distribution the superintendent of documents and the parties, which persons and libraries shall see that as far as possible an equal allowance is made to each member of Congress."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Section 68 has for its object the distribution at once of the vast accumulations of old documents at the Capitol, which at present serve no good purpose whatever, but which occupy room needed for other uses. They are to be distributed as are all other documents published for the Senate and the House, by the superintendents of the folding rooms. If, however, members of Congress do not avail themselves of their privileges by July 1, 1894, these documents are to go to the superintendent of documents, Interior Department, to be distributed to libraries. It is believed that nine months is fully sufficient to enable every Senator and Representative to take action in this matter, and as it is important that the documents in question be distributed without unnecessary delay, it is thought best that what are left on July 1, 1894, should the superintendent of documents for the use of libraries.

Section 69 transfers to the superintendent of documents all surplus accumulations of documents in the several Executive Departments and makes them available for immediate use, and also relieves the Departments of the trouble and expense of

Section 70 has for its object the prevention in the future of accumulations of documents at the Capitol and the making of the surplusage immediately available for distribution, in the main to libraries. It will be observed that the naming of par-ties to receive these documents is left entirely to members of

I move that the committee do now rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, in the bill H. R. 2002 slight typographical error was made in the printing. The bill has not been enrolled or sent to the Senate. In line 19, on page 2, the word "for" should be "force." I ask unanimous consent to make that correction.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion to give me the opportunity to get a resolution considered, providing for printing for the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cum-MINGS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and is kereby, authorized to have printed and bound such documents and papers for the use of said committee as it may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by this committee during the Fifty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] for the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection. The resolution was agreed to. And then, on motion of Mr. RICHARDSON (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday. October 18, 1893, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills were reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. MAHON, from the Committee on War Claims: A bill (H. R. 2717) for the relief of George McAlpin, to repay to him moneys unlawfully collected from him by the United States. (Report No. 52.

Very well; the Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HARRIS. No business can be done until the proposition to amend the Journal has been disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Alabama will proceed Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have not much to add to what I said yesterday on the subject of the motion to amend the Journal. I desire, however, to call attention to one of those half truths Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may interrupt the Senator, I think there should be a quorum present at this extraordinary hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.
The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Hill, Bate, Blackburn, Perkins, Pettigrew, Platt, Hoar, Irby, Lindsay, McPherson, Mitchell, Wis. Morgan, Murphy, Palmer, Walthall. Dolph, Faulkner. Washburn White, La. Platt, Power, Roach, Smith, Stewart Teller, Frye, Gallinger,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators have answered to their names. No quorum is present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

After some delay Mr. Cullom, Mr. Proctor, Mr. McMillan, Mr. Manderson, Mr. Shoup, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Stockbridge, Mr. Coke, Mr. Ransom, and Mr. Hawley entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 10:15 o'clock). Forty-three Senatorshave answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dolph] to amend the Journal of the proceedings of Monday. The Senator from Alubama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, to ascertain exactly the merits of the question raised by the proposition of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dolph] about the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, I desire to read in succession the rule of the House and the rule of the Senato on this question, so that it may be seen how very differently we are situated to-day from what the House was at the time a law was passed the validity of which was subsequently questioned in consequence of the fact that a quorum was alleged not to have been present in the House at the time of the passage of that act. I refer to the case which the Senator of the passage of that act. I refer to the case which the Senator from New York [Mr. Hill] quoted yesterday. I will first read the rule of the Senate. It has been read several times, but I desire to put them on record in juxtaposition:

RULE V.

I. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without

1. No senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.
2. If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Prestding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.
3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

Those are the only rules of the Senate that bear directly upon the question. There are some others that bear incidentally upon the question. There are some others that bear incidentally upon it, but not so as to affect the ruling that was made by the temporary occupant of the chair yesterday. Rule XV of the House of Representatives, upon which the decision of the Supreme Court was based, reads as follows:

On the demand of any member or at the suggestion of the Speaker, the names of members sufficient to make a quorum in the Hall of the House who do not vote, shall be voted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker, with the names of the members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do business.

If the Senate had ever adopted the fifteenth rule that was If the Senate had ever adopted the fifteenth rule that was adopted by the House after such a long and anxious opposition, then I am not prepared to say that the ruling of the temporary occupant of the Chair yesterday would be correct; but the Senate have never adopted that rule and I trust they never will. I believe that they have no constitutional power to adopt it. In that belief I am fortified by at least the opinion of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives who continued a long struggle of opposition against the adoption of this fifteenth rule upon constitutional grounds, they claiming that the rights of their constituency were infringed by the rule, and that rights of their constituency were infringed by the rule, and that it placed in the hands of one man an arbitrary power which broke down the independence of the Representatives and compelled them to sit by, if they were unwilling to vote upon a proposition, and to have their votes recorded in the affirmative on the passage of a bill, no matter what their opinions were, no matter how strongly they objected to being thus called up; and by the mere force of the majority were compelled to commit by the mere force of the majority were compelled to commit themselves one way or the other upon a proceeding on a bill which they considered to be entirely unconstitutional.

I will suppose a case under that rule. I will suppose that a quorum is present in the House of Representatives, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by looking over and counting the gentlemen who are present, all of whom he knows personally and is able personally to identify (which is now always the case by any means, but I will suppose that that state of facts exists), declares that a quorum is present and a bill is put upon its passage. Two votes are recorded upon the call of the yeas and nays in favor of it and one vote is recorded against it; and thereupon the Speaker of the House, a quorum not having answered upon the roll call, directs the Clerk to enter upon the Journal the names of the members who are present who dethe Journal the names of the members who are present who de-cline to vote and who remain merely silent.

Now, upon a question involving anything small or great, but more particularly a question involving some great interests of the whole country and a question involving the constitutional rights and powers of the Congress of the United States to pass the bill that is then before the body, will any man be heard to say that two votes could pass that bill against one negative because the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives chose to make the Clerk record the fact that of Representatives chose to make the Clerk record the fact that a quorum was present?

That tests, Mr. President, and it tests in a proper way, too, the value of the proposition so frequently urged and so forcibly and earnestly advocated here as to whether a bare majority of a quorum have the right to pass any bill they choose to pass against the negative of all the body, except three men, two voting in the officerative and one in the recreive.

Now, will it be said that that is an extreme case? It can not be called an extreme case, because when you depart from the principle that a quorum must be present to do business by the assent of the men who are there to appear as a quorum to do business, it makes no difference what the numbers may be; after we pass that principle it is not tested by the number of persons who pass that principle it is not tested by the number of persons who may vote yea or nay.

If it is to be tested by that fact, then if you come down to the absurd proposition which I have just stated, that a bill of very great import to the country is passed by two votes against one, you have the exhibition of the failure, the utter failure, of government in the sense in which government represents the people of the United States, and has always done it, and must always do it; that is to say, a government that is in some sense responsive to the will of the people. Two men or three men out of a silent quorum present in the Senate or in the House can not claim for themselves that they represent the majority of the American people or that they represent any majority whatever in the constitutional sense of ability to pass laws and fasten them upon the country.

I refer to this because this question is coming up later and we shall have to meet it in some form or other, as I see the old controversy will be renewed here and the battle that has raged now for a hundred years upon this question will have to be fought over again. It can not be rashly intruded into this case for the by the Senate, not supported by the people of the United States, in favor of the sudden and immediate repeal of a portion of the Sherman act and the resnattment of the rest of it. It will not come up just in this particular juncture; but it has to come, and when it does come I hope the enlightened statesmen around me who can see nothing in power at all except the ability to crush out opposition, will consider the case I have just stated, and ask themselves the question whether two men out of a quorum can pass the most important bill that is before the Senate as against one vote in the negative when all the rest of the quorum has been silent, and by their silent negative say to the world and to the Senate that we are unwilling to do business of the kind you propose to have done.

It is true that we are here; it is true that we do not answer to our names; but our presence and our silence indicate that we are our names; but our presence and our slience indicate that we are not here for the purpose of doing the business you want to do. That is not our purpose in being here. We have a right to be here and see what sort of a record you are going to make, to see what sort of plea or excuse you are going to put up before the world whereby two Senators can pass a bill against one negative and call it a vote of a quorum. We have a right to be here and represent our people in a case of that kind and to observe your proceedings; but we are not here with that spirit of constitutional assent which causes us to be present to make a quorum to do business. do business.

We are not willing to do the business you have in hand. The truth is, it might be that the Senate was unwilling to do any business whatever at a time when a bill of this kind was put upon its passage. You say they might adjourn. They might not desire to adjourn. It might not be their wish to adjourn desire to adjourn to order to escape a dilemma of this kind? Who has the right of compulsion upon the free will of the members of this body to compel them to do or not to do anything?

The case that was cited yesterday by the Senator from New York from 144 United States Supreme Court Reports, while it may be twisted and perverted into an apparent support of his position as a judicial decision, can not be placed in that category position as a judicial decision, can not be placed in that category except by the artfulness of an astute politician. A fair-minded lawyer can not do ft. The question in that case is not whether a quorum was actually present, but whether the records of the House showed that a quorum was present. What record? A record made under the rule I have just read. The Supreme Court say that the House of Representatives under the Constitution have the right to make their own rules for ascertaining, determining and recovering the fact that determining, and recording the fact that a quorum was present, and having made their own rules this quorum appeared, according to the declarations of the Journal, to have been present in accordance with that rule.

The Supreme Court never claimed the power to decide upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the rules of either body. They could not do that. That is a question removed from their jurisdiction entirely by the express language of the Constitution of the United States. More than that, it is one of those political questions about which the Supreme Court never concern themselves except to repudiate the jurisdiction.

There are certain questions that arise in the course of legislative procedure in the Congress of the United States that the Supreme Court have continually declared they would not undertake to interfere with to correct in any form whatever. They are called political questions; not questions of party politics, but questions that relate to the general policy of legislation, questions that remain in the discretion of the two Houses in consequence of the fact that they regulate the general policy of the Government; questions that can not be assuiled by the Supreme Court of the United States because they determine a political status or an attitude of government; whereas any question that presents a right of property, the power of government to tax a person, as was the question presented in the case in 114 United States Reports, under a law, brings the individual man, the corporation, or the State, as the case may be, in conflict in its interests with a decision of Congress, if it affects a material interest—that is a question the Supreme Court will take hold of, but not a mere political question.

But, Mr. President, giving, if you please, to the opinion of the Supreme Court and the declaration of the judge who wrote this opinion, not necessary to that decision at all—giving, if you please, the full weight of that opinion and that declaration as a matter of ascertained constitutional law, I should like to know whether the Senate of the United States has reached a condition where it has no longer any opinion of its own upon a question that may be decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in respect of constitutional law. If we have, Mr. President, we have greatly degenerated, and we have reached a condition have greatly degenerated, and we have reached a condition where the Supreme Court can on one day give us authority to legislate and on another day take it away from us. We have reached a condition where the constructions placed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the Constitution of the country one day are obligatory and the next day they are passed away, because the Supreme Court have altered their will and

What become of the faculty and power of representation of the people of the United States when we surrender to the Supreme Court of this country the absolute control of our functions? It is only men with easy consciences who do that sort of thing. There are men in the world whose consciences are so very easy as that they can bend them to any purpose that the political necessity may require at any time. But such men have no just conception of the rights and duties of the representatives of the They are ready on any occasion when it people and of the States. people and of the States. They are ready on any occasion when it serves their purposes and promotes their political prosperity or their desire to deprive a minority of all its rights and all its powers in order that their will may have supreme sway in the

It may suit men of that class to follow the Supreme Court around and to be willing to take an oath of allegiance to their opinions to-day and change the oath to-morrow when their opinions change. That does not suit me. I do not consider that I am bound to any such course as that. If I had considered it so, I should be bound to believe, on the decisions of the Supreme Government of the United States, that no paper money issued by the legal tender, for the Supreme Court solemnly decided that it was not a legal tender, and that nothing but gold and silver could be a legal tender under the Constitution of the United States. That opinion was not agreeable to a great many persons in the United States, and it seemed to be somewhat hard upon the then existing financial condition of the country. Thereupon the Congress of the United States with great liberality increased the court from seven to nine.

Now, what for it is not for me to say; but the people of the United States believed, a great many of them, that it was done in order to get men upon the bench who would reverse that dethe Government of the United States were lawful tender.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama pardon me for a moment, that I may call his attention to the historic fact which he is stating? Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.
Mr. HOAR. The Congress of the United States provided for that increase of judges long before the legal-tender decision was made or announced, and the names of the two new judges were in this Chamber, nominated by President Grant, before the legal-tender decision, in point of time.

Mr. MORGAN. I may be wrong in the history of that matter, but I do not think I am.

Mr. MORGAN. I ma but I do not think I am.

Mr. HOAR. I know my statement to be true, if I know anything in this world. I was a member of Congress at the time; I heard the legal-tender decision; I knew of the nominations after the increase of the number of judges was made. win M. Stanton was nominated and took the oath of office, but he was so ill that he never attended a session of the court and never took his seat on the bench. He died, and a new judge, Mr. Justice Bradley, was nominated in his place. Then Mr. Justice Grier resigned and Mr. Justice Strong was nominated in his place, and those two nominations were sent to the Senate the day before the legal-tender decision was made, and the nominations were published in the Washington papers of the afternoon

However, the statement gained currency as the Senator from Alabama makes it. It was made by several persons of considerable eminence in this country, who on examination of the facts withdrew their statement. It reappears once in a while as a survivorship of an old and angry political contest, but it is without the slightest foundation. Both President Grant and Hamilton Fish publicly stated it. Mr. Fish stated it in a letter over his own signature, and said he was authorized by President Grant to say that neither of them had the slightest idea of the legaltender decision when those two judges were nominated. So that ought to disappear.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts has not understood me to say or intimate that I believed those judges were put there for that purpose

Mr. HOAR. No, but I understood the Senator to intimate—
Mr. MORGAN. I referred to it as a common rumor among the people of the United States which a great many believed.
Mr. HOAR. I understood my honorable friend, if he will par-

Mr. HOAR. I understood my nonorable friend, if he will pardon me, not to say that, but to say that the act increasing the number of judges of the Supreme Court was passed because of the dissatisfaction of Congress with that decision.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I said that was a common belief among the

Mr. MORGAN. I said that was a common belief among the people of the United States. That is all I said about it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will look at what he said he will

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all.
Mr. HOAR. I myself take the Senator's statement of what he said, of course, absolutely.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. Now, as to the opportunity for doing such a thing as that is always open to the Congress of the United States. They can to-morrow make twelve judges on the bench or thirteen by an act of Congress, if they choose to do so. Suppose it was done, and for the purpose of getting a bench there who would rule that the people of the United States have no constitutional rights whatsoever in respect of the production or coinage of gold or silver.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me but a moment to make one statement before he passes from that subject?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.
Mr. HOAR. I made this statement, and I feel an interest in the question not from any ordinary partisan feeling; there are partisan charges and ramors going all the time; but I do feel an interest in the judicial fame of Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr.

Mr. MORGAN. I do, too.
Mr. HOAR. I know there is no Senator on that side or on this side of the Chamber who will not concur with me when I say that in the whole history of jurisprudence there are no purer, whiter judicial reputations than of those two gentlemen, one of whom has gone to his reward and the other is now living in an honored old age.

If the Senator will in his great patience pardon me for one sentence more, I will state that Mr. Justice Bradley is a person in regard to whom Senators entertaining the view of the Constitution which is entertained on the other side of the Chamber, especially by Senators from the Southern States, owe what they must concede a great debt; that it was due to him the amendments to the Constitution were so construed as to require the ments to the Constitution were so construed as to require the affirmative action of a State denying the rights described in the fourteenth amendment to justify the interposition of Congress.

The one great constitutional question affecting the relation of States of this Union and the rights of the States of this Union and the National Government in the matter of jurisdiction over civil and political rights was decided contrary to my opinion, but in conformity with the contention of the gentlemen who think as I suppose the Senator from Alabama does on that class of subjects. So if their view of the Constitution be sound, they owe a debt to Mr. Justice Bradley, which would make, I am sure, no one of them, if otherwise inclined (and I am sure no one of them would be otherwise inclined), disposed to deny the great judicial excellence of that magistrate.

Now, if the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, I say this not as supposing-

Mr. MORGAN. I am quite willing to yield the floor until the Senator gets through with his eulogies upon judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator would allow me to finish one

Mr. MORGAN. It would be a hardship if I did not, and I submit to it. Mr. HOAR. I say this, not in the least supposing the Senator from Alabama or anybody else will disagree with me on this subject, but only to vindicate myself in asking leave to interrupt

Mr. MORGAN. I do not agree that Mr. Justice Bradley is the whitest and purest judge who ever sat on the bench, and yet I think I have as high an opinion of him as the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think he was a man any better than Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say he was. I said there was no whiter or purer.

Mr. MORGAN. We are not here for the purpose of making comparisons between judges. What I am here to ascertain is whether this jurisdiction which existed in the minds of the peoplc, which the Senator has characterized as being so very unjust and very improper, which I am fully willing to accord, was unjust and improper as a foundation of opinion as to the possibillegislative power in Congress, in the creation of ities of our ties of our legislative power in Congress, in the creation of judges. I will put the question again. Suppose it became necessary in the opinion of the majority in the Senate and the majority in the other House to sustain, by a ruling of the Supreme Court, what I conceive to be an unrighteous violation of the constitutional rights of the people of the United States in the passage of the bill which is now before us for consideration. Suppose you consider it to be your privilege and your right to raise the court to thirteen in order that you may get men who you know will decide in favor of the constitutionality and the propriety of your legislation. You can do it. You can stock up the Supreme Court, if you please, with any kind of material that you want, if the President of the United States and a majority of this body will concur after you pass the law, either to raise or decrease the number of judges.

Now, that very opportunity, the presence of that possibility shows that it will not do for the Senate of the United States to take what I call an oath of allegiance to a decision of the Supreme Court; for, no matter what the purposes were, what the motives were, or how it was accomplished, whether by an increase of the number of judges or not, we have seen the Supreme Court of the United States at one term deliver an opinion that nothing but gold and silver was a legal tender in the United States, and at a subsequent term and very shortly after, that a different court delivered an opinion that paper money was a legal tender in the United States. I will further remark that paper being a legal tender, there is no reason why all the paper money issued by the United States, and especially all that class of paper money that is redeemable at the Treasury of the United States, should not be legal tender.

We see, Mr. President, the category we are in when we bind our-selves hand and foot, as the Senator from New York seems to have for the convenience of the present opportunity and occasion, to the decision of the Supreme Court, and then to criticise a man who dares to have any sort of liberty of conscience after a decision has been made. And yet he does not understand that decision, or else I do not; one or the other.

There is no harm, perhaps, in a man who is a chronic sort of a Democrat, who has taken great pride during all of his manhood in adhering to the tenets and doctrines and teachings of the Democratic party, and the fathers of it particularly, to call attention to some doctring stated in Gen. Jackson's veto message of the Bank of the United States bill, "a bill to modify and continue the act entitled, 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,' "which he returned with his objections to the Senate, in which it had originated.

The question was made there that the opinion of the Supreme Court had been obtained that the bank was constitutional, and of course the same argument was resorted to then by the friends of that fiscal measure that is resorted to now by the Senator from New York, that inasmuch as the Supreme Court had decided that the original charter was constitutional, therefore their mouths were shut and they had no right to make any objection to it on the ground of its unconstitutionality. Gen. Jackson still objected on the ground of its unconstitutionality, and he was sustained by the Democratic party of that day, and has been sustained by it from that day to this. He says:

If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act, it ought not to control the coördinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval a.it is of the Supreme judges when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is intependent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not therefore be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative apactites, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve.

Mr. President, I suppose I ought to ask pardon for having introduced this antiquated specimen of Democratic doctrine and literature into this modernized Democratic Senate, but I think I am prepared to make no apology for Gen. Jackson upon this occasion. Let him stand upon the force of his reasoning. If my occasion. Let him stand upon the force of his reasoning. If my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] had got up yesterday and for the first time uttered that as his opinion he would have been speered at and whistled down the wind for having presumed to set up his opinion against the Supreme Court of the United States about anything that comes before him for decision. He would have been required to say, like the Senator from New York has said, "I surrender my conscience to the Supreme It makes no difference to me how much violence they may have done to the Constitution of my country, as a loyal American citizen I bow to the majesty of their decree, and will have no more to say on the subject except to obey."

What would he do day after to morrow if the Supreme Court of the United States were to reverse the decision? Why, he would fly back and forth like a weaver's shuttle, driven by the power that impels it to go in a certain direction and in no other, and as often as the requisite force is applied to him.

and as often as the requisite force is applied to him.

Is that the senatorial authority, responsibility, and dignity, about which we have heard so much? It is said we do a good many undignified things, but I do not know what more undignified thing a man can do in this body than to say, "I will obey the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question coming before me for legislation; I will accept my conscientious duty from them and do their will and pleasure." And I will add that I do not know anything that a man could do that is more unmark than that

The Senator from New York, in referring to some expressions that I was guilty of, I suppose, if that could be said of a devotion to what I conceive to be the Constitution of the country, reminded me that there was a time when he thought I did not have much respect for it, away back in 1860. I never call up those questions, Mr. President, either for the purpose of defending my people, or for the purpose of rebuking anybody else. quarter of a century has elapsed since those events, and I am entirely willing to leave them as they have been left, to the judgment of posterity for the vindication of the conduct of the men who were engaged in them on both sides.

I can only say about it that the movement which resulted in the secession of eleven States from the American Union was a movement that was inspired solely by a conviction on the part of the people of those different States that the Constitution of the United States was being abused to the destruction of their interests, their equality, their rights of every kind, and they went out of the Union not to break up the Constitution of the United States or to express any dissent to it, but for the purpose as they thought of preserving it. That was their idea. No matter how mistaken they were, that was the condition; that was the purpose of the movement; that was the impelling force that caused the secession of eleven States from the American

Now, in that there is at least one fact worthy of remembrance. The people of the United States of all sections, wherever you will find them, are sworn in their hearts to allegiance to what they believe to be the Constitution of the United States. When they believe that their constitutional rights are being invaded, trampled under foot, they arouse themselves and come to the defense of their views of that instrument.

If there was nothing in the question to-day presented before the Senate of the United States but a bare question of policy, there would be little excuse here for any steadfast and firm opposition to the passage of this proposed law. But Senators on this side of the Chamber and on the other, differing in their political affiliations, have solemnly averred here that they believe that this legislation not only in its tendency, but in its necessary effect, is to strike down one of the money metals which has been, I will say, consecrated by the Constitution of the United States, in this, that the Constitution expressly requires of Congress that they shall be coined, and deprives the States, to which theretofore had the right to coin them, of that privilege. It is regarded here that the money metal, silver, is being taken entirely out of the reach and range of its constitutional power and influence, and of justice to it under the Constitution.

That being so, we find as we believe that it is something the people can not give up without extreme loss, great peril to their interests, and without throwing away, as if it were of no account, the benefactions that Divine Providence has hid in the mountains to the west of us, and we believe there is a firm foundation under the feet of the men who stand here like a bulwark in opposition to the passage of the bill, which foundation they in opposition to the passage of the bill, which foundation they feel rests upon the Constitution of the country.

Now, is it not well enough to remember that when men have ideas of this kind and they are participated in by very large communities, when they find distinctive representatives in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, men coming here to represent those ideas and little else, perhaps, of a distinctive character, is it not better for the Senate of the United States to pause and consider what may be the ultimate outcome of this business, and to try to reconcile these opinions amongst the people of the United States, or dissipate them, if they are wrong, by going into the political arena and there explaining to the people wherein they are wrong and we are right?

people wherein they are wrong and we are right?

I claim in favor of the present attitude of this question that it has been badly dealt with in every respect. The people of the United States have the right before this question is finally disposed of to vote directly on it at the ballot box. Did they enjoy that right in the last campaign? No; they did not, neither at the hands of the Republicans nor at the hands of the Democrats. By one universal acclaim on the part of the newspapers and the stump orators of both political parties in the last Presidential campaign we were told that it was the tariff that was the turning point in the campaign; that this was the vital issue; that the silver question was retired behind it, and that it could not be decided in that campaign.

I did not believe it, not by any means, and I voted with the majority of the Senate on that occasion, notwithstanding the Democratic and Republican conventions had met and passed their platforms—I voted here to pass a bill through the Senate originated I believe by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], at all events one exactly like it in principle, and we passed it through the Senate as a declaration on the part of the Senate of the United States that that was a vital question; that it was a living question. When we got through that campaign, then the pressure commenced for the purpose of destroying that which had not been considered and voted upon by the people of the United States, through sudden, compulsory legislation in the Congress of the United States.

An extra session of Congress was called. The people were fearfully alarmed because they found that the President was alarmed; they took fright at something which was not real and substantial, and we were forced to come here into an extraordinary session to consider what? Not the tariff, but silver. The tariff comes in as second fiddle.

Why not allow us to relegate this question again to the polls? Why are you afraid to meet us on the hustings? Why are you afraid of the verdict of the people? I assume that you are afraid because of the haste with which you demand this crucifixion of the people and their rights.

What I claim now, and it is the most material thing that I do claim, is that the people of the United States shall have a chance to express at the bullot box their views upon this question and to give an authoritative declaration of their purposes in respect of it. That you deny to them; that you refuse to them. You assume to be their representatives here, when we tell you that we are as much, and far more, their representatives than you are; and we invite you to go out and try the question with us before the people at the polls. Then we shall know where they stand. Decent respect for public opinion requires that we should do this thing.

It is just as easy to put into this bill whatever measure of public relief that we think is demanded by the exigencies of the times, to put this as an amendment upon it, to offer it, and have it voted upon, as it will be to pass a separate measure sub-

Are we so blinded to the future, has some mysterious obstruction arisen in our front, that we can not see through nor over to discern what lies beyond? Is it true that until we have torn that obstruction down we have not the range of vision to see what is necessary for the good of the people? Is that our situation? Are we thus blinded by something which stands before us, and which we must remove out of the way before we can have any guide of wisdom or light to see what to do for the people of the United States?

people of the United States?

If that be the fact, accept my proposition, which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] refused yesterday to do. Tear down the obstruction entirely; do not pull off the capstone and leave all the balance stand; do not leave the wall standing so high that a man of ordinary dimensions can not look over it, but which would take one of the giant intellects of the Senate to see over the top of it. Do not leave it in that shape; tear it down; for that is what you say you want to do. If we have not mind and sense enough to see what to do for the people until the Sherman law is taken out of the way, take it out of the way, but remove all of it out of the way. That is not what is desired. It is desired that the Sherman law shall stand in all its features hostile to silver; that it shall be removed where it shows the least friendship in the world for silver remonetization, for coinage or anything of the sort

Recurring again to the past, Mr. President, when I went, in obedience to my convictions, with my own State out of the American Union, I insisted as we all did, that we should take the Constitution of the United States with us, and we did so. In almost every material function as to the organization of the government, the limitations upon its powers, and the like, the Constitution of the United States was adopted not only by the Confederate government itself but also by each of the Confederate States; so that the principles of that instrument, that form of government, and the liberties it secured, were shown to be the most precious things that we found in the Ark of the Covenant. We carried them with us when we went out and at-

There was no hostility in the Confededate States to the Constitution of the United States; there was no man who was not perfectly ready to return into the house of his fathers when he found that the resistance that he had been making to it was of no further avail, and the invitation was, "Come home, and you will have the full and equal protection of the law." There is no doubt about that. These States, whose automony had not been affected in their perfection, stood there throughout the whole length and breadth of the Union, and one new State had been born out of the anguish and travail we were then undergoing—the State of West Virginia. We came back because our States were sovereign, because the people of these various States had the rights and privileges guaranteed to them which were obtained under the Constitution of the United States. We did not go out to revolutionize the Government of the United States, but, as we claim, to have justice done to us under a separate political organization, when we failed to get it, as we believed, in the organization of the Government of the United States.

There are men who went out with arms against us who were

There are men who went out with arms against us who were Democrate, men who believed in the doctrines of the old Democratic party, and who have shown it by their more recent acts. No man in this world has a profounder respect than I have for such men; in fact, they have my confidence, they have my affection, and I prize them because they had the manhood to go out and stand on the field with their guns in their hands to oppose me. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] was one of that number, whom I revere for his fortitude and for his decision and for his exposure of his life in the defense of what believed to be right and just. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was another who shouldered his musket as a private soldier and came out to contend with us. William B. Morrison, of Illinois, is another for whom I have the highest and most profound and grateful respect.

But, Mr. President, I do not have so much respect for those men who are constantly quoting that difficulty whenever they have an opportunity to make a point upon a brother Senator or anybody about it, but who did not have the pluck to shoulder a gun and go out to fight. My respect does not extend to that class in that cordial way, at least, that it does to men like Morrison and Randall, and PALMER and SICKLES, and hundreds of others whose names I might call in the Northern States, who came out and took their muskets in their hands and said: "We will try this question with you upon the issue of battle."

came out and took their muskets in their hands and said: "We will try this question with you upon the issue of battle."

I am not alarmed lest one of these gentlemen should quote upon me my attitude in 1860 to 1865, for an honest soldier, who fought me in that war, never does it; only those who hired substitutes and stayed at home and plead the baby act, or something of that kind, for an excuse for patriotic delinquency, are in the habit of getting up in the Senate and elsewhere and quoting upon me the fact that I belonged at one time to the secession and rebel government of the South. I did belong to it, and when a blush of shame comes over my cheek to condemn me for the part I took in that struggle, I shall be still more ashamed of the poor craven creature who can undertake to impose that as a disgrace upon me; for If there is a man in this world who is entitled to any consideration from the human family, it is one like old John Knox, or John Wesley, or Martin Luther, and men of that kind, who fought the battles of Christianity and who fought for freedom of conscience against the strength of the greatest combinations of political and civil and religious power which ever existed in the world. Those are the men whom I revere in history, not those petty politicians whose figures rose suddenly to the surface, like bubbles on a stagnant pond, and exploded, and have left nothing behind them but mephitic odors.

The Senator from New York [Mr. Hill] on yesterday, in a burst of oratory which was as unexpected as it was uncandid, undertook to allude to a former Senator from Ohio, that grand old Roman, Allen G. Thurman, for having in one moment of time—and I think it was an unguarded moment, for I was here time—and I think Is was an unguarded moment, for I was here and saw it—expressed an opinion only, but making no decision, said that notwithstanding the roll call which had been taken in the Senate disclosed the lack of a quorum there was still a quorum present. That was one of those half-truths stated by the Senator from New York, which convey more of misinforma-tion than they do of fact. Mr. Thurman was not properly dealt with on that occasion; and inasmuch as he is now advanced into the sere and yellow leaf and is no longer here to adorn this Senthe sere and years what and is no longer here to adort this Sen-ate Chamber—and no man adorned it more thoroughly than he when he was here as a Democrat, as an American, as a states-man, and as a lawyer—inasmuch as he is not here, I desire that the country shall not be misinformed in regard to the actual state of facts.

The honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] yesterday, with his usual readiness and acumen, at once, because he remembered the transaction doubtless as I did, referred to the facts and laid them before the Senate to vindicate Mr. Thurman againd the charge that he had ever decided as President pro tempore of the Senate that it was his privilege and right to count a quorum when the roll callshowed a quorum was not present. Mr. Thur-man never did that. I shall read it again, notwithstanding the Senator from Florida read it and commented upon it yesterday, to show that the Senator from New York has entirely misunderstood and misapplied that accusation which he made against Mr. Thurman yesterday. Mr. Thurman as President pro tempore of the Senate said:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question will be put, then. The question s, Shall the appeal taken by the Senator from New York from the ruling of he President this morning be laid upon the table?

Mr. CONKLING. On which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been ordered and taken once, but he call disclosed no quorum. The question now is on laying on the table he appeal taken by the Senator from New York.

The question being taken by yeas and nava resulted—yeas 32 nava 21 and nava resulted—yeas 32 nava 32 nava luestion being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yeas 32, nays 2; as

Only two Senators on the Republican side voted on that occasion. All the others claimed the privilege of remaining quiet and silent in their seats, and not voting. No quorum was declared. The absentees were:

Mr. Thurman himself declining to answer, because his decision was the matter in question.

The suggestion was made to me the other day, I think by the Senator on my right [Mr. FAULKNER], suppose that a Senator, in the absence of the Vice-President, were presiding as President pro tempore of the Senate and the roll call was ordered upon the motion of some Senator, and on that roll call the Presiding Officer of the Senate, being a Senator, declined to answer, what would you do with him? Would you compel him to declare that a quorum was present when he said there was not a quorum present, because he refused to answer, and had so cut the list down that the requisite number was not present? How would you get him out of that difficulty? It would be impossible to do it. Here was Thurman upon that roll call, the President protempore of the Senate, refusing to answer. He said:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting, but there is a quorum in the Senate present.

Mr. Conkling. In the opinion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is; the Chair has counted. In the opinion of the Chair, upon reflection, the Chair was in error in causing this last vote to be taken. That matter belongs to the morning hour. It is very true that if a motion had been made to amend the Journal or to correct the Journal it would be a privileged question that would have to be continued until it was disposed of; but no such motion as that was made.

That was a mere casual remark made by the President protempore of the Senate, not a decision at all, that, although the roll call had disclosed no quorum, still a sufficient number of Senators were present. Thereupon that great and learned and astute man and honorable, too-and I love to speak of him-Matt. Carpenter, arose and said:

Matt. Carpenter, arose and said:

Mr. Carpenter. Mr. President, I suppose by this time it must be evident to the majority of the Senate that they cannot coerce the minority of the Senate to do what the minority think they do not want to do or ought not todo. This proceeding can go on just as long as the majority of the Senate choose to have it go on, and it may stop whenever they choose to stop it. The minority of every legislative body are driven at times to stand on their reserved rights, and as to those rights they are the exclusive judges. As was stated last night by the Senator from Ohio, the President protempore of the Senate, on a great occasion he found himself compelled to stand on his rights, and refused to vote, so as to break up a quorum of the Senate, and then understood and now understands that there was no power on earth to prevent his doing so. He did it upon his own conscience, upon his own responsibility, answerable to nobody but his own constituents. What was true them is true now; and we have in the minority here the great example of the leader of the Democratic party, and now the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

sponsibility, answerable to nebody out his one the great example of the leader of the Democratic party, and now the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

We do not enjoy this thing any more than the majority do; but we have a few rights, and we propose to stand by them.

Yesterday, it will be recollected, this bill was before the Senate for discussion. The entire day, with the exception of less than half an hour, was occupied, not by debate upon the bill, but by campaign speeches from Democratic Senators. They had a perfect right to make those speeches, and they took the entire day in making them; and no aliusion was made to the details of this bill, and no discussion of it was had. It was a totally outside discussion of party politics for the country, so declared, so announced, so understood, and so in fact. Then, after 6 o'clock, it was insisted that we should proceed with the debate of this bill or not debate it at all. We should proceed with the debate of this bill or not debate it at all. We thought it was an outrage, not using the word offensively, but a parliamentary oppression, and we thought we ought not to submit to it. We thought we ought to show the majority of the Senate here that if they proposed to treat us in that way we would show them that they could not do it.

Now, if the Democrats of the Senate are willing to adjourn this session to day and let us all have a sleep and a rest and come in here to-morrow to discuss this bill in the proper and the orderly way, there is no doubt a vote can be had upon it to-morrow. I find myself to-day utterly unable to speak; that is, too lift to attempt it. I was up here all night trying to do my duty in the way of executing parliamentary law, and I think we succeeded pretty well in enforcing all the rules of law applicable to the remarkable state of things that we found existing. If the Democrats of the Senate wild do that, if they will adjourn this body and let us have a night's rest and come in here to-morrow, cool in blood and refreshed by slumber, and take up

There was a temperate spirit prevailing in the Senate at that time, and those great men, whose names I have just read, were standing out and refusing to answer to roll calls. The majority in the Senate to-day have not treated this minority, as we are called—who are the majority of the Democrats in this body, who have as much right to control the Democratic action of this body as any majority of a party nature can-they have not treated us in that way. The first motion that I had the misfortune—I will call it—to be compelled to make in respect of this matter was after the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]—who has been, as we all know, in ill health, but who, thank God, is now recovering his physical strength, and with it the commandation of the contraction of his great powers—had spoken for quite a long time in one of the most exact and conclusive speeches—not argumentative merely, but analytical, thorough, and powerful—which ever graced theoratory of this body—said he was notable to proceed any further, that he was not well, and asked that the subject might go over until to-morrow, I made a motion to that effect, and had to obtain a call of the yeas and nays to get that consent. that is only one incident. There are a great many others.

Gentlemen who are in eager pursuit of game scarcely ever pay any attention to the pantings and sorrows and sufferings of the hind they are pursuing. They and their dogs follow on the the hind they are pursuing. They and their dogs follow on the bloody track with the eagerness of pursuit, little thinking of what they are doing to the poor alarmed creature who flees before them, but do they not remember when they do these things the story of Actæon and his dogs, and how, after the dogs of Actæon had caught and devoured the game, they turned around and consumed him? You are turning dogs loose here—I am not speaking of it in any literal sense, but metaphorically—you are turning dogs loose here upon men who are representative men in the highest sense of the word and want to do their dogs to in the highest sense of the word, and want to do their duty to God, to man, and to country, and after a while, when your hounds have destroyed us they will turn upon you and they will rend you, too. They will have no more use for you than a boy has for a last year's bird nest, after they have done manipulating and carrying you along in their political machinery to do their will. The banks and bankers and the gold grabbers will turn upon you and destroy you when your ability to serve them has ceased, or when, in your distress of spirit for the sufferings of the people, you turn to them with a vain but pleasing word of comfort and commiseration.

I spoke yesterday of a coalition, and I was assailed for mentioning it, because it was said there was no proof of it. I have got my opinion about it, and I am now weighing the evidence as to the existence of such a coalition, not that anything has been communicated to me, or that I shall ever hear of it if a bargain exists at all, or the terms of the contract, or who made it. not to be expected that I will ever know, personally, anything about it. I am arguing to myself, for my own satisfaction, in order to be able to steer my own course through this body that I am now in conflict with a conlition. One reason I have for it is that our Democratic brethren on this side, who are in the minority on the silver question, will not go into a caucus with us. It is the first time I have ever heard close communion stated as a doctrine of the Democratic party.

Another reason is that I see these Senators constantly in friendly intercourse and association with some of the great leading minds of ancient and modern Republicanism on the other side of this Chamber. For them, this is novel, a new departure. There seems to be no want of brotherhood between them; in fact, they stick as close and affectionately to each other as a stamp sticks to a love letter. [Laughter.] I have never seen anything more illustrative of the political brotherhood that makes strange bedfellows than in this particular case

Now, looking along over the whole surface of things, if I call it "a coalition," I am using a very mild term.—I do not wish to use any harsh terms about it—but that it is "a coalition" I shall develop before we get through here, and I shall do it by that motion which I told the honorable Senator from Ohio yesterday I would make when I had the floor, that I should move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and put in, pure and simple, the repeal of the Sherman act from top to bottom; leave the matter standing right there, and leave it then to the good sense and the patriotism of both sides of the Chamber to ascertain and to do what they are going to do about it.

Mr. FRYE. And let us vote?
Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes! Do not lay it on the table, do not make a motion to amend it, so that you can go out to the world and excuse it by saying we did not have the merits of the proposition before us, we did not want to consider it. Come up to the scratch and let us vote on it.

Mr. CULLOM. Are you ready to vote now? Mr. MORGAN. As soon as I yield the floor and get through my speech, if no other Senator desires to speak. At the proper my speech, it no other senator desires to speak. At this proper time you shall have the opportunity.

Mr. President, yesterday I put the question directly to the Senator from Ohio whether he would vote for my proposition, and he said no, he did not see any benefit—not in those terms, but in language scarcely to be mistaken—that no man who had any sense would do it. I have taken the pains to go around amongst some of my brother Senators here to know whether in this sky-scraping oratory we have been hearing so much of in the Senate, these great disquisitions upon the economics of finance, and all that, any of them had ever condescended to look at the question in its material aspects as it appears upon the statute books of the United States, and very few have I found who had even read the statutes which are to be affected by this act.

The trumpet had sounded, the forces were marshalled, the clock had struck at the White Honse, and the cuckoos here all put their heads out of the boxes and responded to inform us of the time of day [laughter]; but they did not seem fully to know what they were talking about, and never took the pains to find out the state of the law. They have not looked into at all; I mean that state of the law. They he many Senators have not.

peal the Sherman law out and out, and here is a law which will stand in full force:

That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 4124 grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January, 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act; which coins together with all silver dollars heretofter coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for all debts and dues public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

That law would stand.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator please give the date of the

Mr. MORGAN. That is part of the Bland act of February 28, 1878, the first section. The Sherman law has amended and qualified that act in two particulars to which I will call attention; and when you get the Sherman law out of the way, this act stands in full force and effect, for the Sherman law repeals but one clause of the Bland act—will you please notice that fact and that is the second clause of the Bland act, the purchasing clause. That is the only clause which is repealed by the Sherman act. So when we repeal the Sherman act, the whole of the Bland act not repealed by that act comes into full force, and what I shall read is part of the full force which it contains. I have said the Sherman act modifies the Bland act in two par-ticulars. It repeals it only to the extent I have stated. Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator please read the repealing clause to which he refers?

Mr. MORGAN. Of the Sherman act?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes. Mr. MORGAN. I will read it with great pleasure. I read from section 5 of the Sherman act:

SEC.5. That so much of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled an "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal tender character," as requires the monthly purchase and coinage of the same into silver dollars of not less than $2,000,000; nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver builton, is hereby repealed.

That is all. All the balance of the Bland act stood, and is now the law. All the silver certificates you have were issued under the Bland act—every one—and they were left standing and unaffected by the Sherman act. The Sherman act, I repeat because I want the Senate to understand it, and I want the country to understand it, for it is a very important matter, contains no repealing clause at all, except the one I have just read which applies to the purchase of silver bullion, to be purchased monthly, not less than $2,000,000 worth.

The first section of the Bland act requires that there shall be coined silver dollars. How many? It does not say how many—the unlimited coinage of silver dollars, the unrestricted coinage of silver dollars. How many does the Sherman set provide for the coinage of? It provides for the coinage of the bullion which was on hand at the date of the passage of the law and such bullion as might thereafter be purchased, and at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not believe that statement. I do not believe there is not

I do not believe that statement. I do not believe there is any more discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury in that coinage act than there is in the command of the Bible that you shall serve God. You may refuse his service, but if you things may get very warm for you. But two Secreturies of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, under President Harrison, and Mr. Carlisle, under President Cleveland, have refused to coin silver: they have refused even to coin the seigniorage, or money earned by the United States in the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the purchase of silver bullion, and after they had compliance to the silver bullion. they had complied partially, and only partially, with the mandatory and unequivocal demands of the Sherman law in respect of the coinage of the bullion then in the Treasury, and not bought with Sherman silver certificates—after that they went on and refused absolutely to coin any of the bullion which was bought by the issue of these certificates under the Sherman law. That is how this matter stands. They claim for themselves the discretion to coin or not to coin the bullion in the Treasury.

Mr. President, I never believed that the Congress of the United States could confer the discretion upon the Secretary of United States could confer the discretion upon the Secretary of the Treasury, in respect of either gold or silver, to coin or not to coin at his pleasure. I never had any feeling for the one-man power except to hate it. I have always objected to it. There has been no room in the creed of the Democratic party that I have ever heard of for the presence of the one-man power. and especially in favor of uncontrolled discretion in a subordinate officer of the Government of the United States. I do not know and never heard of the man in whose hands I would leave the discretion to coin or not to coin silver money or gold money, or any other money. That is a delicate subject to deal with, and necessarily involves the most vital interests of the people.

Mr. President, suppose that one of these Secretaries of the Treasury—I grant you it is scarcely a supposable case in view of the facts, still it is not one that is unimaginable, nor is it one that is unsubstantial—owned some silver interest in the West, and he thought that it was necessary, in order to enco rage the production of silver and the sale of it, to coin it as fast as it came into the Treasury of the United States, to buy it at the highest price for which it could be bought in the market and raise the price in that way, and then to coin it and send it out amongst the people, would you intrust him with that power thus to affect value of silver bullion or silver currency?

If you will not intrust him with the powor to coin it because his interests are that way, perhaps you might find that he was a stockholder in some of the national banks, or he might be the owner of a gold mine, or some of his friends might be, or he might think that, by making an exploitation of this kind, he could secure to himself large revenues from the capitalized men of the United States and elsewhere to help him in his candidacy for the next Presidency—it might be easy to im. gine a case of that kind; I do not know that that case is entirely unimaginable—and thereupon, after being intrusted with the discretionary power to coin silver or not to coin it, he would say, "No; no dollar of silver coin shall escape from this Treasury; I intend that my friends, the national-bank men, the gold-holders, and the speculators upon the credit of the United States, who are going to be kind to me hereafter, if they have not been hereto-fore, shall have all the feast to themselves, and therefore I shall not coin one dollar of it; I have the discretion to do it or not to do it." He could put us to great shame if he were as ambitious as Asron Burr was supposed to be.

I do not believe that the Congress of the United States really conferred that discretion, for I think that is a total misinter-pretation of the act, and the misinterpretation of the act is the worst part of the offense, for it is contrary to that well-fixed and well-settled part of the Democratic creed that doubtful powers well-settled part of the Democratic creet that doubtful powers shall not be assumed and exercised by any man in this country. A man must have the plain right to do a thing, and do it in virtue of that right, before he can claim the shelter of the Democratic creed for his conduct. No honest Democrat, no sincere Democrat in this world ever finds himself in the category where he is even tempted to lay his hands upon doubtful power for the purpose of carrying his objects into effect. That is not the Democratic creed; it is just the other way, and always has been.

So, Mr. President, the repeal of the Sherman act would take away that one-man power, and instead of his being invested with the discretion to coin or not to coin silver he would find himself under the command of the Bland act that he shall coin it. That is a proceeding in the direction of the monetization or the remonetization of silver. It is a long step and a strong and steady one in the right direction.

There is another thing which would occur by the repeal of the Sherman law that I desire. Section 2 of the Sherman act pro-

That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this ct shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United tates, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, and hen so redeemed may be reissued.

That is precisely the obligation of the greenback, "redeemable on demand in coin." "Lawful money" means coin. This point was conceded readily by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] on the floor of the Senate on yesterday.

Here is the second clause of section 2 of the Sherman act, to which I wish to call especial attention:

But no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom, then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes.

If you repeal the Sherman act you get rid of that feature, and you can proceed to redeem these outstanding notes and destroy them entirely. That provision of the Sherman act which re-quires that these Treasury notes shall be kept out in a certain volume, to be no greater and no less at any time than the cosof the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom, you get rid of.

You stop the issue of the certificates by the repeal of the Sherman law and thus reduce or stop the outflow of currency, but you save the people heavy taxation to borrow the gold to redeem them over and over again as fast as they are redeemed and reis-

Where will that leave the Sherman certificates? tor from Ohio yesterday said—yes, he had the hardihood to say—that these obligations, with this promise on the face of them. would have no provision for their redemption left in the law if we repeal this act. Ah, Mr. President, that was an unfortunate statement, more particularly because it is not true. These notes, when the Sherman silver act of 1890 is repealed, upon their very face stand on the footing of the greenbacks, and any man can go to the Treasury and he can get the gold for them. The Treasurer of the United States is compelled to reissue them under the Sherman act, but when that act is repealed he can not reissue them. There is no doubt about this.

Here we are, facing the clamor that the finances of this country and of the world have been disturbed because we are buying after and issuing Treasury notes to pay for it, redeemable in gold; that we are paying out of the Treasury of the United States gold for the purchase of silver, and now, under the bill before the Senate, you leave those sections of the Sherman act standing which require redemption, as you say, in gold, and which provide that the amount of these Treasury notes shall not be decreased from what they are now; that when they come in they shall be reissued, and you leave them one unceasing ever recurring, and continual draft on the Treasury to the amount of $150,000, 000 a year.

After you have redeemed these notes and have reissued them as soon as they can be collected together again in any amount whatever exceeding $100, their holders can come right back upon you and make you redeem them again. Repeal the first clause and leave the remainder of the Sherman act standing, and you have a draft upon the Treasury of the United States of $150,000,-000 to act of the Sherman act standing the United States of $150,000,-000 to act of the Sherman act standing the Sherman 000 in gold which you are obliged to meet as often as it can occur—no maceration, no retiring them, no lowering in their number. There they stand, a constant drain and temptation to the bullion dealers here and abroad to collect them together and report the Transport of the Property of the Property rob the Treasury of its gold. How do you propose to prevent it? When you get the country into that hole, you have got us where these raiders have a mastery over us and we have either to disgrace our country and put it in bankruptcy and repudiation, or else we have to give them the bonds they have been clamoring for so long, and we shall have to pay the taxes to buy gold to patin the Treasury. While with one hand you destroy silver, which the people need so much and like so well, with the other hand you tax them to pay interest on $150,000,000 a year for the purpose of keeping up a supply of gold to meet this drain that you deliberately leave in the law by your amendment of the Sherman act, and by your refusal to reveal it. fusal to repeal it.

Do not let us have any more of cant and hypocrisy about this thing. The people are not going to believe you. You can not answer these propositions. There is not a man on this floor who will dare to attempt it, except the Senator from Ohio, and he does it by a disdainful reply that there will be nothing left to protect these Treasury notes in the event of the repeal of his law, and therefore he will not vote to repeal it.

Mr. President, under the statutes gold has a number of advantages over silver of a very peculiar kind. It has the advantage, first of all. of absolute free coinage on the part of the individual man who will take it to the mint. He may go and melt down an old candlestick, or the case of a gold watch, or the carrings of his wife, or anything of that kind, and carry it to the mint, have it assayed and its value ascertained, and if there be a hundred dollars worth of it in the pile, he may demand the coinage of it into eagles or half eagles or whatever he pleases and have it coined. Thatis, gold coinage is not only free, but without charge.

Proceed further and consider gold in respect of its legal-tender qualities. It is legal tender when coined for all sums of money without discrimination as to their being private or public debts, and in the event the gold is so worn and abraded that it is below the standard of circulation your debtor can take the scales and weigh it and compel you to take it. That is gold.

weigh it and compel you to take it. That is gold.

You can carry gold and depositi in the Treasury of the United States and demand gold certificates for it if it is inconveniently weighty in your pocket, and the gold remains there, a trust fund in pledge, which nobody dares to violate, for the redemption of that certificate. That is gold.

When you come to silver, even under the Bland act, the silver dellar is unbrighted to the sulfation right of the certificate.

dollar is subordinated to the qualifying right of the parties to a contract to say that it shall not be received in the payment of a debt, if anything else is stipulated to be paid; in other words, that if you make the contract payable in gold under the Bland act. it can not be discharged in legal-tender silver dollars. is what you have provided. Some of these days a question will arise as to the power of Congress to do that thing, and I have made my promise to the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] that whenever that question comes up he and I will talk about it, and we shall see what the strength of that power is in view of the right of the Congress of the Uni ed States to enact any legal-tender law at all.

I shall not discuss that now. I shall content myself at this moment with reference to the fact that I am contrasting the privileges of gold and silver under existing legislation, as they will be when the Sherman act is repealed, if it is ever repealed. In doing that I am merely undertaking to show what immense advantages gold is given under the statute over silver-the twin metals mentioned in the Constitution of the United States, which our fathers labored so earnestly, so long, and so successfully to adjust properly in fixing upon a unit of value and a correct ratio between gold and silver. In our present legislation we give all the advantages to gold.

Repeal the Sherman act out and out and you restore silver wherever it is found in the possession of the United States, to say the least of it, to the right of coinage into dollars of 412½ grains. Leave the Sherman act there, and you leave in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to coin it or not to coin it at his sweet will

I would not leave any man in this world with that discretion where the rights of the people are so materially interested. There is no Democracy, to say the least, in that; there can not be.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator understand that under the law as it now exists the Secretary of the Treasury has a right to coin what is called the seigniorage in the Treasury?

Mr. MORGAN. I believe he has the right to coin every bit of it; and it wou'd be just the same thing if that law was re-pealed, because the Bland act says "there shall be coined silver dollars," etc., yet the Sherman law, as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Peffer] very properly reminds me, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin as much as may be necessary

Mr. PLATT. There is no doubt about that; but I ask whether the Secretary of the Treasury could coin the rest of the silver bullion under the existing law?

Mr. MORGAN. I would not say there is no doubt about that when two great men like Mr. Foster and Mr. Carlisle have said they would not coin it. 1 suppose there must be some doubt, enough doubt for them to say that they have the right not to coin it. I suppose we can concede that much to them, for two Presidents in succession have sustained them in that position, and a little decree of Congress that they shall do it does not amount to anything in the presence of these magnates, who set aside the law at their will and pleasure. I think the law is set aside; I do not think there is anything else in their action, except a clear trampling out of the mandate of the law. It is repudiation and nullification; it nullifies the law and repudiates a plain duty. They say, "We will not execute it, because you have said something to us; you have used the word 'may' instead of 'must,'" when everybody knows that in a public statute, according to all judicial decisions, where the rights and interests of the people are concerned, the word "may" always means "must," and no man can find a decision of any respectable court of the United States to the contrary of that proposition.

Then, Mr. President, when the Sherman act is repealed, the Treasury notes issued under it stand exactly on the footing of the greenbacks; you add that much to the greenback column. true it is a gold debt, if you choose to work it out that way, but it is a gold debt if you leave the Sherman act standing. More than that, it is kept in perpetual circulation; the wheel con-More than that, it is kept in perpetual circulation; the wheel continues to revolve. It is like a tanner's wheel, driven by buckets with cows' horns fastened on it, which, by the weight of water that flows into these receptacles, are lifted up, the water is poured into the tanks, the wheel never stops, and the water goes right along to flow into the tanner's tank. That operation has I use this rustic illustration its parallel in the Sherman law. not for the amusement of the Senate, but in order that my constituents, who are not all learned men, may grasp the subject and understand exactly what is going on here. I would prefer to stop this wheel by repealing the Shermanlaw. I would break up this tanyard; it is too profitable to the living and of no service to the dead.

But continue the Sherman law, and you continue this process of depletion of the Treasury to the amount of $151,000,000 now outstanding in the hands of—well, it makes no difference whether they are in the hands of the people or in the Treasury. They must be reissued, the amount must be kept up when once redeemed, they can be redeemed again, and one of these one-hundred-dollar bills can draw a thousand dollars out of the Treasury. ury in gold simply by ten different operations, and still go on drawing out the gold as long as you permit the law to remain. That is what the Senator from Ohio wants, and what I do not

If you are sincere, if you believe that this draft upon the Treasury has caused this panic not by anything it has done, but by some expected evil which is to be wrought out hereafter, then repeal the Sherman law, stop the draft, and put these certificates on a footing with greenbacks.

I would not do this, Mr. President; I would not content myself with this if I found there was the slightest relaxation in this body or anywhere in favor of a good financial system. I would take this as the first step, if we must take two when only one is needed, in the right direction. As I observed yesterday—and I will call attention to it again—the first thing that I would do in respect to the terrible condition we are in here now—I speak of the legislative condition—would be to try to find a way out through the action of a joint committee of the two Houses, which should be appointed by the respective presiding officers, very impartially, so as to give the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Peffer] and other Senators, elected as he is, by the Populist organization, a hearing; and so as to give a show to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman], who professes to be a bimetallist, but at the same time can not see the silver side of the question at all; and I would like also to place on that committee my friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockrell], who sits at my left, and made that magnificent argument here recently on this subject, which will go down to posterity to build his name up amongst the brightest and strongest men who have ever adorned the

I should wish that he would be the chairman of the Senate side of the committee, if I could have a choice. My proposition was and is that they should get together and look over the whole financial system, consider gold, consider silver, and all the different species of money that we have now-nine species of money that we have affoat, each one of the eight of them differing from every other one of the nine in legal-tender qualities reconcile all these, take the two silver half dollars, and the four quariers, and the ten dimes, which the poor man has to take as his money for a day's wages—it may be 75 cents—adding to these eighteen grains more of silver, so that that man shall have as much silver in his pocket when he has two half dollars as another man has when he has a dollar coin, so that when the poor man has got all this silver in his pocket to the amount of $10, the result of nearly a month's work, paid by day's wages at 75 cents a day, we will say, he is not short 180 grains of silver in his $10. Rectify that.

Take these national banks in hand and cause them simply to understand that they are often all beggars on horseback, that they are not mounted in a position to ride roughshod over the people. They get all their power from acts of Congress, from our indulgence, and our petting them from time to time. Tell them that they must do justice to the people, that the screws and tortures of their usurious exactions must be relaxed, and the people must have a chance to live; tell them that while we are paying taxes upon all the money that they issue in order to enpaying taxes upon all the money that they issue in order to enable them to issue it, they must not lock up the money in their vaults and refuse to pay their depositors and issue shinplasters for the payment, one of which I have here. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson] thought I did not have it, I suppose. It is a 50-cent shinplaster issued to the people. That is the kind of money the banks pay them and which the people have to put in their pockets.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date?

Mr. MORGAN. August 12, 1893.

Mr. BUILLY. What is the date?
Mr. MORGAN. August 12, 1893.
Mr. PLATT. Issued by whom?
Mr. MORGAN. Issued by the national banks in Birmingham, not in their name. They have a dummy. They were smart enough to do that, of course.

Mr. PLATT. Read it. Mr. MORGAN. It reads:

BIRMINGHAM CLEARING-HOUSE CERTIFICATE.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., August 12, 1898

This certifies that the People's Savings and Trust Company Bank of Birminghan, Ala., has deposited with the undersigned committee of the Birming clearing house, securities to the value of 60 cents, to secure the bearer hereof in payment of the sum of 25 cents in lawful money of the United States, payable at any time after ninety days from the date hereof. This certificate will be received on deposit by any bank or banker of the Birmingham clearing house at par.

Signed, Cobb, R. D. Johnson, Dickson, Hentzelman, I believe, Stearn, Elliott, etc. There ought to be another law about national banks, and that is to require the officers to write their names so that some one could read them. I have scarcely seen one yet that I could read.

They ought to be taught that when they keep the people's money on deposit they can not lend it out to stock gamblers and to speculators in bullion, and so on, at will and pleasure, so that they shall have more than $1 in the vaults of the banks of the United States for every creditor's $25 deposited there.

That is what is the matter with the country. with a view of making speculation, have loaned out their money on call to stock gamblers and the men who corner bacon, pork, flour, corn, coffee, and sugar, and all the essentials of life, in order to make the poor people of this country pay higher prices for the actual necessities of life. When the depositor wants his money, it is not paid to him if there is stringency in the stock market. Your money on which you pay taxes, and the people pay continually to keep in circulation, is used by these men for that purpose; and whenever the slightest danger comes, or the apprehension of it appears to these favored and petted gam-blers, then a cramp takes place in all the dealings of the banks, discounts stop, and a money panic runs through the country like the cold runs through the bones of a man under the effects of one of the blizzards from the Northwest.

That ought to be corrected. I want to correct it in the resolutions that I offered. There are many other evils that need to be corrected. But when my resolutions came into the Senate there had to be a struggle for an opportunity even to have them explained, and then they were sent to the Calendar, and they might as well have been sent to the tombs. I have had no power to get them up from that time to this. Nor has any Senator who has offered a bill on the subject of finance in the Senate had any power to get any of those measures before this body, even an adverse report, except the two pet measures that have been brought forward by the Committee on Finance, one to amend the Sherman act and reënact it, and the other to increase the issues of national banks 10 per cent.

Who obstructs the business of the Senate when a committee under the command of the Senate takes a bill offered by a Sen ator and carries it into a committee room and locks it pigeon hole and refuses to act upon it or to say a word about it?
Who obstructs the business of this country except that committee which turns the key upon the door of legislation and says, "You shall legislate about this and nothing else; you shall not be heard to open your mouth about anything else? If you bring an amendment in here we will lay it on the table by an arbitrary majority." The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] who has become the mouthpiece, I suppose, of somebody here, uttered—Mr. MILLS. I become my own mouthpiece here.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, your mouthpiece.

Mr. MILLS. And I have a right to speak my sentiments here, and I shall do it on all occasions when I feel like it

Mr. MORGAN. You have certainly a right to do that, and you have a certain responsibility about what you do, and I pro-you have a certain responsibility about what you do, and I pro-pose to hold you up to it.

Mr. MILLS. My constituents will hold me responsible. I deny your right to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. So will I. You need not deny my right; I intend to do it. Mr. MILLS. I shall take care of myself, when the time

Mr. MORGAN. All right. The honorable Senator from Texas said that he would not vote for any amendment of the pending bill whatever. Well, I take that as being ex cathedra. Am I mistaken? Was that an utterance on behalf of the committee or of the majority of which he is a distinguished member, or was it a mere private expression of opinion? "No, sir, I do "No, sir, I do not intend to vote for any amendment whatever to the bill.

well, if a determination such as the Senator expressed obtains throughout the committee, the rest of us, the Senator from South Carolina and myself, have nothing to do but to cross our hands and be handcuffed and then blindfolded and then be turned over to the tender mercies of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHER-MAN], who will pack us away in cold storage and keep us, I suppose, until we have either changed our opinion, or have gained greater confidence, or our freedom of thought has become petrified. I suppose that is to be our fate. Mr. President, if I am to be handcuffed and blindfolded a Democrat shall not do it. If we must have a master of that sort let him be a Republican who is used to such business as that, and not a Democrat.

No, sir; you lock the bills up in the committee and will not report them back here, and if an amendment is offered you will move to lay it on the table, and, perhaps, the most distinguished light now in the Senate of that party, certainly a man of great power, informs us that he will not vote (and I suppose he will power, informs us that he will not vote (and I suppose he will not permit any of the rest of us to do it if he can help it) for any amendment to the bill, that we must take it as it is offered; that we must take it upon the principles of the gold cure, or faith cure, or some other kind of a cure. Well, Mr. President, if I am bound to take this nostrum, there is only one thing left for me to say about it, and that is it shall be "well shaken before

Then when any of us pretend to talk about having a right to be heard here in debate, to present questions that they do not dare to try to answer, and know they do not dare to try it, we are threatened with cloture—this importation from the Parliament of Great Britain-which has been so attractive to the Senator from New York, who found his examples and his precedents yes-terday for the advocacy of a cloture alone, I believe, in the Parliament of Great Britain. The Senator certainly forgot that when we escaped from British dominion we also escaped from the power of the prerogative of the British Crown, and we do not permit the Executive Government of this country to sit in this Chamber with us. We established independent departments, executive legislative, and judicial, each independent of the other, and each having the right to acquit itself in its own peculiar sphere, according to its constitutional discretion, as I understand it.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to suggest that Great Britain never adopted cloture during all its history until the gold men got in power?

Mr. MORGAN. It never adopted it until after 1816, though I do not think that was the reason for adopting it. I think they adopted it for the reason that there was springing up in Great Britain too much liberty. There were representatives there of the people who were disposed to make a clamor about things, and bring up rights for consideration like the Irish question and the Welsh question and the disestablishment question, the corn laws, and a great many other very important questions that have agitated the British Parliament now for the last half con-

The people of Great Britain were getting to be very free with their thinking. Well, it is a bad thing for an arbitrary power to have a constituency that are free to think; still worse if they are free to speak; very much worse if they are free to vote; and still more intolerable if there is a written Constitution some-where that men are sworn to and the right of the rulers to think, and to act, and to vote, and the like of that is under some restraint. But in the United States it is not under the restraint of prerogative as it is in Great Britain. There the Queen sits in both Houses as a member, and every law which is enacted in Great Britain is enacted in the name of Her Majesty and the Commons and the Lords. She is there, in the Parliament, an active participant, if not in fact, at least upon theory. So, when a man finds himself a member-elect in the Parliament in either House, and he says, "I will not vote upon this question. I will stand out;" they say to him, "Your act is just the same as if there had been a penal statute requiring you to vote, and you have refused to do so; and you have been condemned to vote by the court; you have become recalcitrant and would not vote; the

the court; you have become recalcitrant and would not vote; the judgment of the court is that you be punished for not voting."

Can you do that here? Well, you can when you get a king or queen here, but not before. The parallel drawn for the purpose of convincing us that we were under the power and dominion of an arbitrary majority in this body came from the wrong place, and came too late by just about a century. We seeded from that doctrine about a hundred years ago and got rid of it, and I was in hopes no Democrat would ever undertake to quote it in this body. But it seems I was mistaken. The Constitution it in this body. But it seems I was mistaken. The Constitution of the United States has a title to the acts that we are required

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Not by the President, not by the Supreme Court; it is enacted by Congress, and only by Congress, consisting of the two Houses. The President is given a part in the legislative power of this country, but unless it is the quiet part of approving it must be a veto power that he exercises. Having that right and power to protect himself, his Administration, his conscience, his views public policy upon the measures that we enact here, it is expected that he will confine himself to the exercise of that power and that he will not undertake to control the action of Congress.

When the President comes here, as I have seen Presidents do—and I am not making allusion to the present case particu-larly or at all—when Presidents come here and prescribe to us, as Presidents have done, a course of legislation; when they have as Presidents have done, a course of legislation, when they have even submitted bills to us of a particular form which they de-manded that we should enact, the Senate, and the House too, have said to them in no unmeaning terms: "You have the veto power and can exercise it when we have acted and annul our legislation unless two-thirds of the members in the House shall vote against your veto, and when you leave your veto in the Executive Mansion and come here to participate in legislation and to guide us in that you must not feel at all affronted or in any way guide us in that you must not feel at all affronted or in any way disappointed if we take up the veto power and use it on you. You shall not interfere with us. It will require a two-thirds majority of the Senate to do it. Yes, under the Constitution it will require four-fifths to enable you to come here and mark out a line of policy to be used by us. We will not submit to that." That is the attitude here to-day, if the President of the United States is attempting anything of the kind, and I confess I have not seen in his message anything more than advice on this subject; but I have seen in the coprogration of the members of this ject; but I have seen in the cooperation of the members of this body on either side a very strong indication that a particular line of action was laid down to us, from which there should be no departure under any circumstances or conditions.

Now, I do not like that. I do not think that is fair; neither do I intend to submit to it as long as I have any lawful and constitutional power of resistance. If I am a member of an independent department of this Government, I must be left free to exercise my rights as such, without unnecessary and improper constraint to be exercised over me.

I have now pointed out as fully as I desired to do, though I might go still further to show what the state of the law would be after the repeal of the Sherman act; but I can say to the friends of silver on this floor that the repeal of the Sherman act out and out would be a great advance over the existing state of the law More than that, it would require these very men, if they are sincere in their statements, to proceed with us to legislate for the benefit of the country, not to accept a nostrum from the hands of the political doctors and swallow it, and wait to see whether the result is to be effective or beneficial.

They will be obliged immediately upon the repeal of that law to open their committee doors and bring these bills back for consideration, so that the Senate of the United States might have some chance to pass an opinion upon some of these measures.

I confess, sir, that according to my conception of it, I have never seen such a ruthless exercise of arbitrary power upon any question in this body since I have had the honor of being a mem-

Mr. VOORHEES. Under the circumstances, with the utmost kindness to the Senator from Idaho and to other Senators, I feel it my duty not to yield.

Mr. DOLPH. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. The motion of the Senator from Oregon will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Teller and Mr. Voorhees addressed the Chair.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.
Mr. Teller. I understand that the question now is upon the approval of the Journal of Monday's proceedings, and upon that I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further objection to the approval of the Journal?

Mr. TELLER. I have the floor, and I object to the approval of the Journal, at least until I have been heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado. The Chair merely stated the question that is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a cycetton of order.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his question of order.

Mr. HOAR. My question of order is that under the third rule the Journal is approved as a matter of course without any vote or question, unless some Senator moves an amendment to it, which amendment is debatable, and if the Senator from Colorado desires to preced he went reserved. desires to proceed he must move or suggest some amendment to

Mr. TELLER. I will move an amendment if necessary, but I do not understand that to be the rule.

Mr. HOAR. It is the rule.

Mr. TELLER. But there must be affirmative action on the part of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will suspend until the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 86) for the protection of persons furnishing materials and labor for the construction of public works;
A bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the construction of public works; the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892;
A bill (H. R. 2344) for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks;

A bill (H.R. 3130) to repeal in part and to limit section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and A bill (H.R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was unable to hear the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I said I did not think it requires a motion; but if the rule requires a motion, I move that the names of the Senators who were present in the Chamber and did not answer on the last roll call be added, to wit, myself and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. President, I do not understand—

Mr. HOAR. The motion ought to be stated by the Chair.

Mr. FAULKNER. I submit, if the motion refers to the last roll call—roll call-

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; the last roll call referred to in the

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; the last roll call referred to in the Journal, of course.

Mr. HOAR. Let the motion be stated by the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be reduced to writing in order that the Chair may state it correctly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that I do not understand it is necessary that I should make any motion at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend until the Chair disposes of the point of order which has been made.

Mr. HOAR. May I be permitted to state the point of order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. The first section of Rule III is as follows:

The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, and any mistake made in the entries corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of.

My point of order is that the Journal is prepared by a sworn officer of the Senate on his responsibility and is read to the Senate for its information; and when that is done it goes upon the archives as a matter of course, without any affirmative action or vote of the Senate whatever. It does not require a vote if the Journal be approved or adopted under this rule. If, however, when it is read for information, it appears to be—

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him-

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; not now. Mr. HARRIS. As he is making an argumentative state-

Mr. HOAR. I am stating the point of order with the leave of the Chair, and I should like, if the Senator will pardon me, to finish the sentence.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply wanted to ask a question. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor

Mr. HOAR. I have not finished my sentence yet. The rule goes on to say that the Journal shall be read. It does not make goes on any privileged question as to approving it, or any question at any privileged question at all. The reading is "shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it," that is, the motion, "shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of."

I understand that the true way (of course it is but formal and not a substantial matter in this case) is for the Senator from Colorado to point out his objection to the Journal by making a motion to amend it or to correct it according to the fact as he deems it to exist. That raises a debatable question, and that

Now, I will with great pleasure answer any suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, with the leave of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. The question I wanted to propound to the Senator from Massachusetts is, first, who does approve the Journal of the Senate's proceedings? Is it not the Senate that must ap-

Mr. HOAR. It does not require any approbation of the Sen-te. It is read for information only, unless there is a motion to

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the contrary, the Senate sits in judg-ment the first thing every morning, after the reading of the Journal, as to whether it is a correct narrative and as to whether

Mr. HOAR. That is not a question.

Mr. HARRIS. And it is a question that the Chair should put to the Senate, except for convenience and economy of time the usual habit is to say, "If there be no objection the Journal stands approved."

Mr. MANDERSON. With the consent of the Senate and the approval of the Chair, let me suggest that so far as the approval of the Journal is concerned it follows, as is suggested by the Senitor from Massachusetts, as of course; and the question put to the Senate is not, Shall the Journal be approved? and in the absence of objection its approval following, but the suggestion is made by the Presiding Officer, "If there are no suggestions of amendment to or correction of the Journal it stands approved.

Mr. HOAR. That is it exactly.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the invariable language of the Presiding Officer at the commencement of the session after the Journal is read. Now, turning to Cushing's Manual, where, upon pages 169 and 170, the matter of the journal of deliberative bodies is spoken of, I find this language, which certainly is an advocacy of the position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the uniform practice of the Senate:

The Journal is to be corrected, either at the suggestion of a member, or upon motion, when the reading is completed. It is then considered as approved by the assembly, to which no formal vote or proceeding is necessary: if the correction suggested or moved is made, or none is suggested, the approval of the assembly follows, of course.

So it does seem to me that no motion is needed on the part of any member of the Senate, nor does the Chair volunteer the proposition or question, Shall the Journal be approved? It follows as of course under the rule and by the practice of deliberative bodies when all suggestions to change or amend have ceased.

Mr. TELLER. To save any question, I move—and I will now change my amendment slightly so as not to include the Senator from Idaho—I move that the name of H. M. TELLER, a Senator from Colorado, be added to the last call recorded in the Journal of yesterday, made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum of the Senate was present or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be read from the

The Secretary read as follows:

It is moved that the name of H. M. TELLER, a Senator from Colorado, be added to the last call recorded in the Journal of yesterday, made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum of the Senate was present of

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States has been treated, in the early part of the legislative day, to several lectures by Senators as to the duty of Senators. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] proceeded to lecture the members of this body. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] followed in the same line, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHER-MAN] did the same thing.

When the Senator from Ohio, with his great experience in this body, lectures me I submit to it with a good grace. When the Senator from New York or the Senator from Delaware lectures me I do not submit to it with a good grace, not because of any lack of ability on the part of the Senators from New York and Delaware, but because they have not had as much experience in this body as I have had, and because I am not inclined here or elsewhere to admit that any one in this body or elsewhere has a higher appreciation of the duty of an American Senator than I have myself.

I say now, with the possible exception of the Senator from Ohio, whose length of service here may justify him, no Senator on this floor has a right to lecture any other member of this body. It is not only a violation of the rules, but it is a notorious violation of the canons of good order and decency. Who gives the Senator from New York the right to come here and say that Senators who are acting upon their oaths and their conscience are not conducting themselves in accordance with the principles of constitutional law within the rules of the Senate? Who authorized, as was done here the other night, a Senator on the other side of the Chamber to declare that Senator on the other side of the Chamber to declare that Senators who sit in their seats and do not vote are not only liable to expulsion, but deserving of expulsion? Why, Mr. President, the like of it was never heard before in this body. I have no doubt it will be heard repeatedly hereafter, because I have noticed that one evil habit is always followed by any town. of this kind constantly grow.

Mr. President, it is said that this is a courteous body.

lieve it may be truthfully said of it that it is a courteous body; at least it has been a courteous body since I have been a member of it. There has always existed between members of this body a proper respect for the opinions of other Senators. tor from Ohio said yesterday that the Senator who called for a quorum violated the rules of this body. The Senator from Ohio could not have read with any care and attention the rules of the body, nor could he have studied the Constitution on this subject.

The Constitution of the United States declares that there shall be a quorum present in the Chamber whenever business is transacted. The rules of the Senate declare that at any time and under all circumstances that question may be raised, and when raised there is but one duty of the Chair, and that is to call the roll and ascertain whether there is a quorum present, and if no quorum is present then the Senate must cease to do any kind of business except that which the Constitution provided it might do, and that is to bring a quorum here. It is as powerless from that moment to do any business except that specified in the Constitution as a town meeting is to legislate for the people of the United States.

So a call of the Senate is not a violation of the rules. It might be a violation of the proprieties of this place for any Senator who knew there was a quorum present in the Chamber to demand a roll call, and yet it might not. That might depend entirely upon circumstances. But certainly it was not when the coll calls are made as they have been made here, with the statement by the Senator who made the demand that there were 20, 21, or

The Senate convened at 11 a. m., and we sat here from that time until 6 o'clock at night, and not a day for at least two weeks was there a majority of the friends of repeal in this Chambor. Who made up that quorum? The men who were opposed to repeal. Who made up the quorum the long nights that we sat here, the thirty-eight or forty hours that we sat here? There never was a single hour during that time after the night session began that the opponents of the pending bill did not furnish a quorum of this body; I will venture to say since the session be-gan, in the seventy-two days, there has not been one-fifth of that time that there has been a quorum in this Chamber of those who are in favor of repeal.

Yet the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York and the Senator from Delaware worked themselves into intense excitement over the statement that the minority here are obstructing the majority. Why, Mr. President, the friends of repeal have not had a majority here. It is doubtful whether to-day peal have not had a majority here. It is doubtful whether to-day they could bring a majority into this Chamber if the opponents of repeal should decline to vote. Again and again the minority might have adjourned the Senate in the middle of the day until the next day or for three days. We did not do anything of that kind. We came here and debated this question. We insisted that we had a right to debate it. Yet before the debate was closed, long before it was closed, and before anybody here could claim that it was closed, we were forced into a continuous s ion of nearly forty hours, and the next night it was repeated.

sion of nearly forty hours, and the next night it was repeated. I do not know how long the session lasted; it is immaterial.

We were forced the other night to remain in session until 10 o'clock, and yet none of the time after the lights were lit was there a quorum present of the friends of repeal. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Vest] said yesterday, or to-day legislatively, they called upon the opponents of repeal to make a quorum for them.

Mr. President it is indepent for any Secretary.

Mr. President, it is indecent for any Senator to stand here and assert that there has been obstruction of the character that has been asserted on this floor, and if that is out of order I will sub-mit to being out of order. When Senators tell me that we have mit to being out of order. When Senators tell me that we have brought disgrace upon the Senate by our obstruction to this measure, it is time the country understood that with all their pretended zeal, with all their pretended indignation, they have not been here to vote themselves. If they had been here to vote they would not have needed to call upon us to make a quorum, and they would not need to complain if we satelient in our seats.
We have a right to sit here under the Constitution and under the law and under the precedents of the Senate, made, I repeat, as I said the other day, by the most illustrious men who ever sat in this body.

In this country majorities rule. We have heard here day in

In this country majorities rule. We have heard here day in and day out that the majority were satisfied now to take a vote, and therefore the majority ought to vote.

Mr. President, majorities rule in this country, but they do not always rule in a day. Sometimes, in a country like ours, where there is freedom of thought and freedom of speech and freedom of action, it takes a long time for the majority to crystallize its opinions into law, and it is right that that should be the case. It is perfectly proper that the majority of legislative bodies shall be compelled to wait until public opinion may indicate that public opinion is back of them.

What is the majority in this Chamber? What account is that if there is not a majority of the people of the United States back of the majority? It is not the majority of this Chamber that controls; it is the majority of the American people. For the first time since I have been a member of this body I have heard it stated here on the floor that because the House of Representatives had passed upon this question the Senate of the United States could neither debate it nor exercise its judgment on the very that we were bound to except the opinion of the House of Step.

could neither debate it nor exercise its judgment on the vote; that we were bound to accept the opinion of the House of Representatives as the opinion of the American people.

Mr. President, a rule that I have always tried to observe in this body prevents me from replying to that misplaced argument, if argument it can be called. I am not at liberty to speak of the House of Representatives. I am not at liberty to speak of the methods of that body. I am not atliberty to speak of the methods of that body. I am not atliberty to speak of the methods that were employed by anybody to influence that House. I leave that for the great public criticism that will come to them if they make any mistakes. It would be indecent for this body to criticise the other House or any member of it. It is equally indecent for them to criticise us. for them to criticise us.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States is founded upon the theory that each department of this Government is absolutely independent of the other; that is, that the legislative department is independent of the executive, and the executive in the exercise of its duty is independent of the legislative department, and the judicial department is independent of both executive and legislative. That has been the rule which has been applied in this country for more than one hundred years. That is the rule which applies in every country where parliamentary government exists. That is the rule which applies in the great mother country from which we have derived our language and our laws.

The legislative department of Great Britain is absolutely in-dependent of the executive. The Queen of Great Britain is understood to be opposed to home rule. She would no more dare to say in the public prints in the way of an interview that she hoped home rule would fail than she would dare to write her abdication, for she would write it very quickly if she would say it. The coming king of Great Britain, upon the death of his mother, is supposed to be opposed to home rule, yethe would never dare to say in Great Britain that he hoped home rule would be defeated.

And that ought to be the rule. The legislative department should be independent. The Government of Great Britain has given to the executive of that country the veto power. It is true it has never been exercised in two hundred years, but the power has never been taken away from it. It is still there. I do not suppose that there has been a ruler on that throne for a hundred years who would dare to exercise it; and I have not any doubt that its exercise now by the present sovereign would change in a fortnight the whole constitutional form of government of Great Britain.

The President of the United States has a duty to do provided The President of the United states has a duty to do provided in the Constitution, to submit to this body and the other questions which he desires to have considered, to give us information as to the state of the country; and when he has done that he has done all the Constitution allows him to do; he has done all that his predecessors have been accustomed to do. in these modern days we are told by the public press that the President has demanded what the Senate shall do; that the members of the Cabinet are frequently interviewed by the newspapers and declare that "we have made up our minds to repeal the Sherman law, and if it takes a month to do it we will take a month, and if it takes six months; and

Mr. President, I need not say that it is a rule of parliamentary law, as well as of general law, that rumor may reach such a state that everybody has a right to take cognizance of it. For more than four months the newspapers have been full, in this country, of the statements of what the Executive wanted and what the Executive intended with reference to the repeal of the Sherman Cabinet officers have been interviewed and declared what act. Cabinet omeers have been interviewed and declared what they wanted, speaking for themselves and the Administration, to such an extent that no man on this floor who has regard for his reputation will rise and deny that they are truthful statements, and that the great weight and power of the Administration, with its immense patronage, is backing and pushing the pending bill; and not only is the Administration in favor of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, but the Administration is the same patronage and the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, but the Administration is the same patronage and the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, but the Administration is the same patronage and the Administration is same patronage. declares publicly that no compromise shall be made, and a bill must pass for unconditional repeal or not at all. I have a paper here that I desire to read as to the statement by members of the Cabinet. There are Senators on this floor who know when I make this statement that members of the Cabinet within the last three days have declared that no compromise would be accepted by the Executive. When I make that statement they know it is true, because they have heard it.

Now, I am not given to criticisms of executive officers. I would rather not criticise an Executive officer and I would rather not at any time criticise one who is not of my political I have always felt free to criticise a Republican President because I am a Republican. I have never failed to criticise him when I thought he deserved it; but I have been reluctant to criticise the Executive officer who is not of my faith for fear it would appear that it was prejudice, or partisan heat, or parti-san opposition that made me do it. However, in my opinion, we have reached a point where the Senate can no longer allow we have reached a point where the Senate can no longer allow this to go without somebody protesting against it.

I find in a Democratic paper, published in the city of New York, called the Daily America, an article purporting to be an interview with Mr. Carlisle; and I will state that I am informed that the same article has appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal, a Democratic paper. I have not any question but that it is a correct interview. If any Senator thinks it is not correct, the course I should be represented in the senator thinks it is not correct. of course I should be very glad to have him so state and give his reasons for thinking so.

STICKS TO REPEAL.

It is headed-

STICKS TO REPEAL—OARLISLE STATES THE POSITION OF THE PRESIDENT—HOPES TO HAVE THAT BAD LAW WIPED OUT—MAY NOT SUCCEED NOW, BUT IS UNSWERVING—IN THE MEAN TIME THE SENATE IS TO BLAME—HOROSCOPE OF CONGRESS FOR THIS WEEK.

I do not care about reading the newspaper comments on the position of the repeal bill, but I want to read what is supposed to be the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I will venture to say that the Secretary will not deny that this is his position and the position of the Administration. I understand they are not beating about the bush or under cover.

A number of Senators called to see Secretary Carlisle to-day-

That was on the 15th of October-

That was on the 15th of October—and in discussing the situation the Secretary very plainly stated the Administration's position in the following terms:
"We have done our duty and now have nothing to offer. The Administration asked Congress to repeal the purchase clause unconditionally, and Congress has not done it. The responsibility for any further action must rest with the Senate.

"There is one plan of compromise that the Administration could accept with honor, and this is to defer for a definite period the date of operation of repeal. This Administration finds upon the statute books a bad law, placed there by the Republican party. We ask Congress to remove it. The Democratic House compiles promptly. The Senate, yielding to the domination of a small majority of Republican fillbusters, does not comply.

Mr. STEWART. A majority?
Mr. TELLER. The article says a "majority," but it evidently meant a "minority."

Does any one imagine that the President can abandon his position of de-landing this repeal?

Mr. President, what right has the President of the United States to demand repeal? The President may submit to us, over his official signature, that in his opinion the law is a bad one and ought to be repealed. That is as far as he can go. When he has gone that far he has gone to the extent which the Constitution allows; he has gone to the extent of the rule which should prevail always in a free government, and he can not go another the Secretary says: step. The Secretary says:

ere is one plan of compromise that the Administration could accept

Who is to make a compromise if it is to be made? Is it to be the President? Who has endowed him with legislative power? What right has he to come here and say to us "this compromise will not be satisfactory to me?" It is usurpation; it is a violation of constitutional law; it is a breach of the privileges of this Senate which ought to be resented.

Senate which ought to be resented.

I repeat again that no monarch outside of Russia would dare to make that statement to his parliament, not even William of Germany; yet the papers have been full of such statements for more than two months, and no man except the Senator from New Senator and the senator from New Senator from New Senator from New Senator for the Senator vada [Mr. STEWART] has been found in this Senate up to this with the reproof which it deserves.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Colorada a question!

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.
Mr. McPHERSON. Does the Senator from Colorado know that the President of the United States has interfered with the Senate in any manner whatever? Mr. TELLER. I think I do.

Mr. McPHERSON. In the legislation now pending in this body?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator, but I do not intend the Senator shall make a speech in my time.
He will have an opportunity when I get through.
Mr. McPHERSON. Let me ask another question, to be answered at the same time. Does the Senator find in that alleged interview with Secretary Carlisle any intimation from the Sec retary that the Administration was attempting to influence legislation here?

Mr. TELLER. I shall answer the Senator if he will let me proceed. I shall call attention—and it will be a full answer to his question—to the President's letter to the governor of Georgia. No other is needed. I shall not assume that the newspaper reports are all true, or that even a tithe of them is true, for in fact I do not believe all of them are true; but he will be a brave Senator who will stand on either side of this Chamber and declare that, in his judgment as a Senator, he does not believe the President has attempted to interfere or influence the action of this body. The Senator from New Jersey will not do it. is body. The Senator from New Jersey will not do it.
Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator please state his question again? Mr. TELLER.

Mr. TELLER. I have not asked any question. Mr. McPHERSON. Then, will the Senator repeat his state-

Mr. TELLER. I will repeat it for the benefit of the Senator. I say he will be a brave Senator who will stand here on either side of this Chamber and declare that, in his judgment, the President has made no attempt to influence legislation in the direction I have mentioned.

Mr. McPHERSON. I declare it, Mr. President.
Mr. TELLER. Very good. Then the Senator marks himself as a good deal braver than most men.
Mr. McPHERSON. The President has made no such at-

Mr. TELLER. I shall not say anything offensive to the Senator, for, of course, when he says so he believes it; but outside of the Chamber I might make some other remark. [Laughter.] There is one plan of compromise that the Administration could accept with honor-

Who was speaking in the interview I have been reading? The financial minister of this Administration. That is all they can accept. If that is not acceptable to Congress, Congress must go.

It must be acceptable to them.

I am alraid that we have reached a point in partisan zeal and partisan prejudice where whatever is acceptable to the Executive is acceptable to a great number of people in this country. It would not be polite for me to say, nor would it be in order to say, acceptable to Senators, so on that point I better not express an opinion.

Let us see what else is said here:

Does any one imagine that the President can abandon his position of demanding this repeal?

What is demanding repeal but attempting to secure repeal? A demand from the President of the United States in any way is very potent and powerful in influencing the action of his partisan friends. Where the Constitution has clothed him with authority to make a demand, it becomes very persuasive to the majority of the people; it commends itself to their judgment when it would not otherwise have done so. An Executive demand should be a demand provided for by law. The Constitution does not give the President any right to demand that we surrender our judgment to his.

Does anyone suppose that he will be willing to forsake the principle and come down to dickering over terms of an arrangement with men who have delled public opinion and effected what might almost be termed a revolution by obstruction in the Senate?

I suppose that means that he would not dicker with the men who are opposed to repeal. All of the Senators who are opposed to repeal in this Chamber have certainly not been guilty of obstruction in any way or manner, because, as I before said, the vote which kept the Senate with a working majority has been that of Senators who are opposed to repeal.

Does any one think the President will give his consent to having the Democratic party move out of the position which it occupies, that of demanding a wholesome and necessary reform, so that the Republicans might have an opportunity to step in and take possession of it? Of course not. The Democratic position is that this bad Republican law must be repealed.

I do not know. I am not a Democrat, and I have not been a I do not know. I am not a Democrat, and I have not been a Democrat for nearly forty years; but when I was a Democrat there was not a Democrat in the great State of New York, in which I then lived, who would not have been in arms against that kind of a declaration by the Executive. In those days Democratic Executives did not lay down the policy of the Democratic party. I do not know now but the election of a Democratic party. Democratic Executives did not lay down the policy of the Democratic party. I do not know now but the election of a Democratic President authorizes him to determine what is Democratic policy and what is no!. Not being a member of the party, I am not competent to determine that question. I leave that for Senators who sit on the other side of the Chamber. I know very well, though, that if any Republican President announced that he was looking after the policy of the Republican party, and that he would not allow certain things of that character to be done by the Republicans of the country who might differ from done by the Republicans of the country who might differ from him, I should resent it.

This bad Republican law

A law, Mr. President, on which we went into the campaign of 1890, a law on which we made the campaign in Ohio; and if I am not mistaken the Senator from Texas [Mr. Mills] went up into the State of Ohio and made a speech, in which he declared that the law was about as good as a free-coinage law, and I think he thought it was so good that he could cease the efforts which he had been making for twenty years in favor of free coinage, because he thought we had a law which practically, as he stated, he had been making for twenty years in favor of free coinage, because he thought we had a law which practically, as he stated, as I recollect from his published speech, would absorb all the product of American silver. It was a law which the candidate of the Republican party for governor in the State of Ohio eulogized in every speech he made on the stump, a law which the great majority of all the Republican State conventions of 1800 and 1892 indo sed without question.

It is "a bad Republican law," we are told. It is a Republican law, but I deny that it is a bad Republican law, in the sense of the term which the Secretary uses. I believe it was one of the acts, of which there are a great many in this country, which was passed by Republican votes only, not a Democrat in either House voting for it, and not voting for it not because it was such a vicious law, but because they did not believe that it was enough better than existing law to justify the change; because they said, "You have a law on the books which is a better recognition of silver as money than this law." So they said, "We will not change the law that puts all the silver which is purchased into money for one that does not put it into money." In addition to that they said that the time would come when some Secretary, in utter violation of the law, in utter contempt of the plain provisions of this statute, would say, "I decline to purchase silver bullion under the law." We did not then anicipate that the present Executive would be elected, or that he would have the present Executive would be elected, or that he would have the present Secretary of the Treasury. I remember with what vehemence and earnestness the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockreell] declared to us that this law would be made the means, by a hostile Secretary of the Treasury.

tor from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] declared to us that this law would be made the means, by a hostile Secretary of the Treasury, of debasing and degrading silver, and that under it, on the pretense that silver was not offered at the market rate, he would decline to buy it; and I remember what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said, in substance, that if a Secretary of the Treasury did that he ought to be impeached. Yet, I find now, within the last two months, I think I am safe in saying, that not more than one-half of the amount which the law provided should be purchased by the Secretary was so purchased.

This has been done under the pretense that the holders have been asking too much for silver bullion, when the only other market they have got in the world is the market which the Secretary says he takes as his guide, the London market, and every ounce which he declines to buy goes across the water and is sold in the London market, where it must be sold higher than it is sold here, or it would not go there at all. No holder of silver bullion will take it to the Treasury and decline the Treasurer's offer, provided he offers the market price in London, and no holder of silver bullion will ship his silver to Europe if he can get an equal price in America. Because of these defects in the law, Senators said they declined to vote for it. We put it on the text the book and it was executed not in the best prepared but it statute book, and it was executed not in the best manner, but it was so executed that every month during that time there was a purchase of silver under it to the full extent of the provisions of the statute.

It was soon after the Administration changed and soon after silver had fallen to a price which no man living supposed it ever would, that the Secretary of the Treasury declined to buy it at any price. If this is a Republican law, as I have before stated on this floor, it is bad in its execution, it is almost useless to us, for there is no benefit to be derived from it, or but little benefit to be derived by the silver-producing States if it shall continue to be executed by the present Administration in the manner in which it has been executed since the 1st of July.

The Secretary proceeds:

If we can not repeal it this month we will repeal it some other month.

Who will repeal it?

If we can not repeal it this year we will repeal it some other year. The Democratic party could, with perfect consistency, pass repeal now to take effect a year or eighteen months hence. In case that were done, it would be a perfect justification for us to say that we have accomplished the purpose for which we set out, the mere matter of time as to when it is done not being as important as the fact that it is done.

It is the principle for which we contend. But those who feel some responsibility for what happens in Congress will make a great mistake if they repeal this bad Republican measure and then put in the place of it another almost as bad—

What business has he to say, either in his own right or as the representative of the President, what we shall do here? I resent it for myself as a breach of the privileges of this body. Finishing the sentence, the Secretary continues:

which will go to the country as a Democratic measure, passed while the Democrats were responsible for Congress. A little concession in the way of time, a concession which does not change the principle at stake, would not be as harmful as to do nothing at all. The principal point is repeal of the Sherman law, and that we are going to have somer or later.

Secretary Carlisle told these Senators that in his opinion unconditional repeal was stronger in the Senate than any compromise measure that could be prepared. "If maked repeal is the strongest proposition, why talk compromise?" was his pertinent inquiry. One of the Senators made answer by saying that while it was true unconditional repeal might have more vote than a compromise, there was this great difference between the two propositions—one could not be brought to a vote and the other can be.

Then there are some other matters which are not particularly pertinent, and I do not care to continue the reading further.

The Senator from New Jersey says the President made no effort to influence legislation. He denies that the President has done so. That is the Senator's opinion. On the 27th of September, 1893, the President of the United States wrote a letter to the governor of Georgia, in which he said:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., September 25. My DEAR Sin: I hardly know how to reply to your letter of the 15th instant. It seems to me that I am quite plainly on record concerning the financial question. My letter accepting the nomination to the Presidency, when read in connection with the message lately sent to the Congress in extraordinary session, appears to me to be very explicit. I want currency that is stable and safe in the hands our people.

That is a good sentiment. I agree with that. I am in favor of a sound and stable currency, and any Senator or anybody else who asserts that we who are in favor of free silver are simply in favor of free silver for the purpose of cheap money, in the usual sense of that term, is in error. We are the sound-money men of this country, who believe in the use of silver and gold at a parity.

I will not knowingly be implicated in a condition that will justly make me in the least degree answerable to any laborer or farmer in the United States for a shrinkage in the purchasing power of the dollar he has received for a full dollar's worth of work, or for a good dollar's worth of the product of his toil.

I not only want our currency to be of such a character that all kinds of dollars will be of equal purchasing power at home, but I want it to be of such a character as will demonstrate abroad our wisdom and good faith, thus placing us upon a firm foundation and credit among the nations of the earth.

I want our financial conditions and the laws relating to our currency so safe and reassuring that those who have money will spend and invest it in business and new enterprises instead of hoarding it.

Mr. President, at some time during this debate I shall comment upon that statement.

You can not cure fright by calling it foolish and unreasonable, and you can not prevent the frightened man from hoarding his money.

I want good, sound, and stable money, and a condition of confidence that will keep it in use.

Within the limits of what I have written, I am a friend of silver, but I believe its proper place in our currency can only be fixed by a readjustment.

of our currency legislation and the inauguration of a consistent and comprehensive financial scheme. I think such a thing can only be entered upon profitably and hopefully after the repeal of the law which is charged with all our financial woes.

Does the Senator from New Jersey think that it is an ordinary thing for the President of the United States when a great controversy is going on concerning the repeal or nonrepeal of a statute to thus publicly declare his desire that that statute shall be repealed? Does he think that that has no tendency to industrial the state of the control of the co ence men in the direction of repeal? Does not the Senator believe that that was written for the express purpose of influencing those who might not be willing to vote for repeal?

Mr. McPHERSON. Does the Senator want an answer now?
Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; I will let the Senator answer now.
Mr. McPHERSON. I do not see how there is anything very inconsistent or improper in the President writing such a letter, inasmuch as he had called Congress together and recommended the repeal of the Sherman law. That is my answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. TELLER. The letter of the President continues:

In the present state of the public mind this law can not be built upon, nor patched in such a way as to relieve the situation.

Is not that a declaration for unconditional repeal? Is not that a suggestion to the Congress of the United States that it must be unconditional repeal or nothing? Is not that in accordance with the repeated declarations of the press, made everywhere, that the President and his Cabinet were opposed to any compromise whatever?

Does any Senator here say that the President of the United States has thus the right to intrude his opinion upon us through the public newspapers or through a letter written to the governor of one of the States? If he does, if that is admitted, then of course there is the end of this argument, so far as that is concerned. cerned.

1 am, therefore, opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver by this country alone and independently; and I am in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law

Now I come to the most astonishing part of this letter. I do not know how it will strike the Senator from New Jersey, who seems to be here the special champion of the executive department of the Government, but it strikes me as being—to use the mildest language—greatly out of place in any communication that the President shall make either to Congress or anybody

L confess I am astonished by the opposition in the Senate to such prompi action as would relieve the present unfortunate situation.

My daily prayer is that the delay occasioned by such opposition may not be the cause of punging the country into deeper depression than it has yet known, and that the Democratic party may not be justly held responsible for such a catastrophe.

Yours very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

If there is anything more needed to show the interference of the Executive with the rights of this body it can be produced. I said that this would not be tolerated in any nation having a constitutional and parliamentary form of government.

In this connection I want to read what I understand has been read, but is still pertinent and proper to read in support of the statements I have made. When Strafford was about to be attained by Parliament, Charles I came to his rescue by intimating to certain members of the House of Commons that he would not approve of a bill of attainder if it passed. I think I may say here now that he was the last executive of Great Britain that ever attempted that thing. I think I can say, without fear of contradiction, that since that time no executive of Great Britain ain has ever intimated that if Parliament passed a law he would veto it. Here is what Hume says of that proceeding:

The King came to the House of Lords; and though he expressed his resolution, for which he offered them any security, never again to employ Strafford in any branch of public business, he professed himself totally dissatisfied with regard to the circumstance of treason, and on that account declared his difficulty in giving his assent to the bill of attainder. The Commons took fire, and voted it a breach of privilege for the King to take notice of any bill depending before the houses.

That has been the rule in Great Britain ever since, if it was not before. I do not know that it had ever been declared before that time, but that has been the rule since.

Mr. President, I have heard a great deal about the dignity of the Senate; I have heard it on both sides of the Chamber; I have heard it from Senators who had no claim to speak on this subject higher than that of the rest of us. There is no man in ject higher than that of the rest of us. There is no man in the Senate, nor any dozen men in the Senate, that can degrade this body. The misconduct of one Senator or a dozen will never degrade the American Senate. The American Senate will be degraded, though, whenever it abandons the great prerogative of independent legislation given to it under the Constitution. Whenever the Senate of the United States shall take its orders from Cabinet councils or the Executive, then there will be degradation of the Senate, a degradation that will imperfit the existence of this body—a degradation, then, that the people of this country will take notice of and understand.

While it maintains its right of independent self-judgment above the other House, above the Executive, and above the Cabinet, when it declines to be stampeded by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and the combined capital of New York City, Philatelphia and Boston, when it maintains its stand against these delphia, and Boston, when it maintains its stand against those influences, it will demand and receive the respect of the American people. But when it surrenders, Whether it be to the Cabithe President, or to public clamor, its degradation will begin and its usefulness will be at an end.

What was this great body organized for? Our fathers, when they organized this Government—I repeat, as I said before, and as has been said by hundreds—were students of government. There never were in the world anywhere so many men, in proportion to population, who understood the true principles of govportion to population, who understood the true principles of government, freedom, and civil liberty as the men who organized the form of government under which we live, and who established this body. Look at the debates, study those great men in every department of their lives. They were thoroughly equipped. They said, "One legislative house is always an unsulphy of the property of the principles of the property of the propert safe body. A legislative body consisting of one house is always liable to be stampeded"—if I may use a modern term—"in times of great excitement it can not be relied upon. We will have two

After they had determined that it was proper to have two After they had determined that it was proper to have two bodies, then arose the question how to have two bodies, how to elect them. They said, "We will settle this question of the difference between great States and little ones by giving to each State an equal representation in the Senate of the United States. Then," they said, "there will be a conservative, careful, attentive Then," they said, "there will be a conservative, careful, attentive body that will deliberate, consider, and weigh all matters that come before them." They had not found out then this new doctrine that whenever there is a public clamor that Senators believe means public condemnation if they do not yield, they should yield to it. They had not yet learned that it can be said in this body that the majority have a right to rule without reference to the justice of the measure proposed or without reference to the rights of the minority. They said that a body independent of the people of the minority. They said that a body independent of the people at large, responsible only to the States, will be always ready to listen to debate, to consider. While public clamor, partisan zeal, and hate may sometimes sweep away the more direct representatives of the people, the Senate will stand firm in defense of human rights; they will see that at all times every bill that comes before them shall be considered with thought, with deliberation, and with intelligence, and shall be conformable to justice and with the state of the right. For a hundred years and more this body has justified the wisdom of the founders of the Republic.

It has never been stampeded yet, and it never will be. Majorities may get stampeded here, but there will be enough here to prevent a vote at any time with haste and speed to override the will of the people, or to override a minority who may be the representatives of the great mass of the people.

No sooner had this Senate assembled in September than the boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and great combinations of capital in New York gave us our orders. I will not say, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] said the other night, that any Senators have had collars on their necks, but I will say that the order came here as if we had been menials, and lackeys, and slaves.

We were told early in the session that the great unemployed people of the country, great numbers of them who wanted work, were coming here to influence the Senate in favor of legislation in their interest, but they found themselves too poor to come. With the same statement came another that 1,300 representatives of boards of trade and chambers of commerce were coming here to bring their influence to bear upon this Senate and compel it to act with haste; to act at once. According to the judgment of this Senate? No; according to the judgment of the boards of trade and chambers of commerce who were to come here to influence this body; speedy and hasty legislation in the way they determined that legislation should go. Mr. President, the chambers of commerce came and they went. The Senate is still debating the question whether the people of the United States shall arrange and have their own financial system or whether Great Brit in shall dictate it to us.

The President of the United States says he is astonished. am glad he is. I have no doubt that is a truthful statement. I have no doubt but that the Executive believed, when he assembled Congress on the 7th of August last, that his order, his demand, would be readily complied with. He would not have so thought, Mr. President, if he had been a student of the history of this body. He would not have so thought if he had been as familiar with the doings of this Chamber as some of us are. But that he did so think no not be suggisted. He declares in his that he did so think can not be questioned. He declares in his letter that he is astonished. If the newspaper reports can be relied upon, he has declared in interviews that he is astonished that we do not proceed promptly to do the bidding of the Execu-

I am one of those who are said to be in the minority in this Chamber. I do not know whether I am or not. On some phases of this question I certainly am. On others I may not be. The people of the United States at the last election put the power of government in the hands of the Democratic party. They declared that they were dissatisfied with the Republican administration, and that they turned over the great interests of this nation—greater than those of any other nation in the world—to the Democrats in this Chamber and in the House and to the Executive. Did the people demand that this bill should be un-conditionally repealed?

There is not a Democrat here who so read that platform. There was not a Democrat in the United States who so read that platform. Upon every stump, where there was any interest in this subject, they proclaimed their devotion to the use of both silver and gold as money. They won upon another ground. They made the great distinctive feature of the contest the ques-tion of the tariff and the repeal of election laws; and upon that the voice of the American people was heard, and their ver-dict has been announced. They said they were dissatisfied with our management of the tariff question, and they wanted it re-formed. I differ with them in that view, believing for myself that much of the prosperity that has come to this country has come through the protective system of my party. But I bow to the will of the people, and no act of mine at any time shall ob-tract or hinder the Demogratic majority in this Chember in struct or hinder the Democratic majority in this Chamber in exercising the power with which they have been intrusted to carry out the will of the people, because upon that question the people have been heard.

If unconditional repeal of the Sherman act had been made a plank in their platform, and upon it that party had won, I should have contented myself here with a simple remonstrance against its repeal unless something took its place. But upon that the people have not been heard. Upon that there are more Democrats in accord with me than there are Republicans.

Why, take the great States that are here represented, each by two Senators who are opposed to repeal. Take Mississippi, take Alabama, take Arkansas, take Missouri; take Texas, at least one-half of whose delegates who are opposed to repeal. I can also name Virginia and other States where the Democrats are pronounced in favor of the rejection of this bill unless something better takes its place. It is no answer to me, nor is it an answer to them, for Senators to say, "This is a bad bill; we will repeal it." You said to the people in your platform that you be-repeal it." You said to the people in your platform that you believed in the use of both gold and silver, and the people took you at your word. If you prove false to them now you will surrender your trust at the end of four years.

You will not undertake to cheat them out of their tariff legislation. You might as well do that as to undertake to cheat them out of the silver legislation that you promised. If in those States the friends of silver on this floor who voted for Mr. Cleveland had voted for somebody else, he would not now be the Chief Executive.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] took occasion to lecture the Democratic portion of this Senate as to their duty. For myself, I do not think I have any such right. My relations to that party are not such as to enable me to speak for them. I hardly think I have a right to speak to them as to their duty. They know their duty, and I must assume here that they will do it. If they think it is their duty to vote for unconditional repeal, they will so vote. If they think, on the contrary, that the interests of the Democratic party in the country require them to vote otherwise. the country require them to vote otherwise, I have no doubt they will so vote.

The complaint is that we do not vote at all. It is said that we are trifling. The Senator from Ohio said we have been here seventy-two days—seventy-two days, Mr. President, dealing with a question that touches the interest of every living American, that touches the interest of every civilized man on the face of the globe. Seventy-two days! Do you think that is too much? Do you know enough about this question? I say here that I know that more than half of this Senate have never studied this question as their duty requires them to study it. This is legislation for weal or for woe. It is not an ordinary question. It is a question, I repeat, that may make homeless men by the million in this land, and, in my judgment, if it goes one way it will. It is a question which, properly solved, may bring prosperity and happiness.

If you repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act and establish gold monometallism in this country your legislation will bring distress and disaster and ultimate ruin not only to the people, but to the Government itself. Yet we are told that seventy-two days is too much: that these great financial concerns in Sherman, Smith, Stewart, Stockbridge, Teller, Vest.

Vest, Vilas,

Voorhee

Walthall, Washburn, White, La.

New York, the board of trade, the chamber of commerce, and the great exchange, are impatient to get rid of this question that they may sell a few more stocks!

The Senator from Ohio told us that when we repealed this law there would come prosperity; that then the unemployed men would be employed. Mr. President, repeal will not bring pros-perity to this country. I assert here now, that if the purchasing clause of the Sherman act shall be repealed, without any provision for an increase of money in this country, there will be disaster instead of prosperity. There will be more tramps in six aster instead of prosperity. There will be more tramps in six months than now. Can not the American Senate sit here to determine, first, whether this law is the cause of the difficulty, and if it is, how we shall get rid of it, and what we shall put in its place, without having our motives impugned, our characters assailed by those who know absolutely nothing, and care nothing about the interests of the great masses of men whom we attempt here to represent?

On this question I do not desire to go into a general discussion of the silver question, for whilst that would be perfectly proper under the rules, I prefer to do that at another time and in another

I confess, Mr. President, that I have been restive, but not under these imputations, not because they affect me. I am as insensible to criticism from those sources as any man living can be. I have known but one method in my life, and that has been to follow my convictions of right. If I have enlightened my judgment, as I have always tried to do, upon a subject, I follow my convictions to their logical results. I never ask anybody's approval, and I am not to be dissuaded or deterred by their dis-

The Senator from Ohio says we violate the rules of the Senate when we decline to vote. They say that is obstruction. It is obstruction. Mr. President, I never shall forget when the Senator of the Senat tor from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who spoke yesterday, was addressing the Senate on the force bill, or rather, perhaps, on the proposed cloture rule, that he said obstructive measures are left to the minority for the preservation of liberty, and that when you suppress obstructive measures you destroy liberty in this country, or words to that effect. I can remember how he raised himself up, and I can remember that every man on this floor felt the truth of that statement when he made it. When you destroy obstructive measures in legislative bodies you have made the grand and final step toward absolute and one-man power—absolute on the part of the majority, in the first instance, and ultimately one-man power. You must have obstructive tactics left, and they are left under the Constitution and rules for the protection of the interests of the people.

When I say upon my conscience that I believe I am discharging my duty to my country and to my people by remaining silent in my seat, no man has a right here or elsewhere to impugn my A man has no more right to say that I am not in the exercise of a great constitutional privilege, by sitting quiet and breaking a quorum, than he has to say that I am acting contrary to the Constitution when I am voting.

Mr. President, I have been looking up the record. here that men of most excellent character, men of great reputa-tion, who have sat in this body, have sat here and declined to vote. I have before me now a statement of that distinguished Senator from Ohio who was here when I came into this Chamber, Mr. Thurman. I have his statement made that he sat in this Chamber and declined to vote, for the express purpose of breaking a quorum to defeat legislation. I find nowhere, when breaking a quorum to defeat legislation. I find nowhere, when he made that statement to the Senate, that he thought it necessary to make any excuse. But I need not speak of the late Senator from Ohio only. There have been many illustrious men in this Chamber, there have been many such great men in this Chamber since I have had knowledge of it. I think I may say in many respects that Senator was the peer of any man in the Senate at that time or at any other time. Did anybody ever doubt his integrity and his great fairness or his ability? Not at all.

It ill becomes Senators to criticise those who followed such illustrious examples. I remember seeing the Plumed Knight sitting in this Chamber and declining to vote—a representative of the State of Maine, and that too upon subjects of minor im-sitting in this Chamber and declining to vote—a representative of the State of Maine, and that, too, upon subjects of minor importance as compared with this. I remember the great Senator from New York, Mr. Conkling, of whom I will say here that no greater has sat in this Senate for many years, in my judgment—a man who, in all the times that tried men's souls, never allowed a breath of suspicion to rest upon his fair name. His intellect all men admired and admitted. I have seen him sitting here a whole night and declining to vote under roll calls. I remember a motion that he had made upon which he declined to your a motion that he had made upon which he declined to vote. have seen nearly every prominent man that has been in this Senate in seventeen years doing that thing. Yet we are told now that when a question of so much importance is before the Senate we are guilty of misconduct if we fail to respond to our names and thus help to keep a quorum to assist the majority to outrage and ride over the people of the United States in the interest of capital, in the interest of the money-lenders, in the interest of those sections of the country that have accumulated great wealth, which they are using to oppress those sections of the country that have

I said, Mr. President, I was restive. I have been restive because it seemed to me that there was a condition here that required a protest from men who do not make it. restive because I have seen, I think, the Senate in danger of being stampeded by a false cry, a false alarm; because I believe that there are men in this body who owe a duty to their country that they fail to discharge when they fail to protest against the agencies now employed to secure the repeal of the Sherman act. I am restive because I see the party with which I am affiliated, and have been since its birth, surrendering abjectly and slavishly their judgment to the Executive, to outside clamor, and outside appeals.

I do not believe that the Republican party in this Chamber has come up to the high position that it formerly occupied, and I felt restive on that account. I have heard it stated here that the other night when the Senate was to be held in session until 10 o'clock the orders had come from the White House that we should sit here at night. I do not know whether that is true or not. I do not make the charge, but I know it was so regarded by some on this floor. If true it called for reproof, but I heard no reproof, no objection, and the majority acquiesced in the demand for a night session.

Mr. President, this silver question is not a sectional question. It is not a question that the silver-producing States are alone interested in. It is aquestion that all the people of the United States are interested in. I will admit that there are neighborhoods and sections of the country which have not the same interhoods and sections of the country which have not the same interest that others have. I recognize the fact that New England, under a system that I have approved, has grown wealthy, and their banks are full of money. Their savings banks hold more money, in proportion to population, than the savings banks any where else. They have a great deal of money loaned out in other portions of the country, and they have an interest in it in this way which we do not have in the West. If they can make every dollar that they own purchase as much as two dollars did here. dollar that they own purchase as much as two dollars did here-tofore, then they have doubled their capital; but they have doubled it at the expense of all other parts of the United States, and at the expense of the great masses of men in the States where these deposits are held.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that a quorum is not present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators are weared to their names:

Mr. TELLER. I stated what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] said as to obstructive tactics in legislative bodies, and as I know I did not quote him with the force, the yigor, and eloquence with which he made the statement, I ask that I may be allowed to read it. This was, as I recollect, the question of limiting the debate in the Senate under the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] in 1891. I want the Senate to hear this

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will please refrain from audible conversation.

Mr. TELLER. I do not complain if the Senate does not hear me, but this is too good to be lost, in my judgment.

Somebody had interrupted him; and he says:

One moment, if you please. I do not wish to be interrupted so. It is all a farce to talk about the reasonable limit of debate in the opinion of majorities, if you are to be content that free speech and liberty of debate have any place longer in American institutions.

You say that the power of obstruction must be put down, must be taken from the minority, that it is intolerable, this opportunity and liberty of obstruction that the minority has, when the majority makes up its mind. Very well. Let us destroy the power of obstruction and you have destroyed free parliamentary government. Obstruction is the very weapon of liberty in all English-speaking countries. There is no unimpeded path for a majority to walk in, no unobstructed road for its will to be worked through, unless that road and that path lead to despotism. Obstruction in parliamentary proceedings by a minority has been the fruitful source of some of the grandest achievements of human liberty that this world has known. You can not do away with it. You can not destroy it without at the same time doing away with the muniments of freedom and destroy liberty itself.

We can put up with obstruction, we can pay the price of our liberties. Mr. President: we can disponse with the haste and with the so-called business methods that obtain in some parliamentary bodies, because we are willing to pay the price of liberty. If you want a smoothly working machine, if you want a governmental framework that will produce at the least expense and in the shortest time given results, then I say go to your despotism, go to a crowned czar, or go to an unrestrained majority, an unobstructed majority, and there you will get results speedily, quickly, and inexpensively, without cost of time. But you will get other results, too. The spirit of freedom will have to die, and the spirit of American liberty will have to have suffered a fatal lesion before that desirable state of things can be brought about.

Oh, Mr. President, those are words worthy of the American Senate, and worthy of the great Senator from Delaware. It is a voice lifted up here in defense of freedom and liberty. It is a voice lifted here in defense of minorities. As I said before, I remember the thrill that went through the Senate when the Senator, with a voice that I can not reach, enunciated those principles that I believe to be as unassailable as the truths of the Declaration of Independence.

So say we, Mr. President, and so we plant ourselves upon the rights that the Senator said belong to us, if minority we are. Now, we are told that we are in contempt of the Senate, that we are in violation of its rules, that we are bringing disgrace upon this great body. Since this controversy has been going on, I suppose I shall be within bounds if I say that I have received a hundred letters from men who have not understood the rightsof the minority, which were abusive, insulting, and in some instances they were vulgar attacks. We have been the some instances they were vulgar attacks. We have been the subject of vituperation and condemnation by the great press of the country because our course does not correspond with their views of right. Against them all I put the declaration of the Senator from Delaware. It is enough for me when it coincides with my idea of right, of justice, and truth. I do not care for their I am willing to have them continue.

I will not rely alone upon the Senator from Delaware, although I might. I should feel fully vindicated if I had nothing else. I stated a little while ago that Mr. Thurman had in this body declined to vote on an occasion of comparatively trifling importance with this, and I was asked by Senators, while the roll was being called, if I would read it and call attention to it, and as I intended to read Mr. Thurman's remarks upon another point, which I intended to touch a little later, I will read it now.

In 1879, the Democratic party were in control of the Senate. I was then a member of the Senate, but I will state that I was not present on that interesting occasion. I was out of the city, but I remember the occurrence. There was a session that lasted all night and into the next day. The minority declined to debate an important question that night.

The debate had lasted all day and the majority in this Chamber thought best to continue the debate during the night. Senator Conkling, Senator Blaine, and Senator Carpenter of Wisconsin, and Mr. Thurman on the Democratic side were prominent actors in the scene. The minority Senators not only declined to debate but they sat silent in their seats when their names were called; and they had the roll called to ascertain the presence of a quorum. I see before me the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt], who took me to task the other day very severely.

Mr. PLATT. I acknowledged that time, the Senator will remember

Mr. TELLER. And that is the only time I suppose the Senmr. TELLER. And that is the only time I suppose the Senator ever did it; but he was in most excellent company. On that occasion he was present at the roll call, but he did not vote. Now, before I touch upon that, I want to call attention to this supposed duty upon me to vote. I do not receive attacks of that kind with any equanimity, I will admit. When a man assails my integrity I resent it. I have not been in the habit of allowing people to do that without at least a remonstrance, and exceller will I not close it. cially will I not allow it when my conscience acquits me of crime; when I feel that I am exercising the highest duty of an American Senator. The Senator from Connecticut the other day said that in my utterances here I had declared I would violate the rules. I declared nothing of the kind. He said the rule requires me to vote, but I said under certain circumstances I had a right to exercise my judgment and not vote.

The Senator has refrained from voting a hundred times in this Chamber. I do not me in to say he sat silent in the Chamber a hundred times, but when some Senator has said to the Senator from Connecticut "I desire to go to lunch and I do not want to come back, will you just pair with me?" he is paired with the Senator. When some Senator has said "I would like to take a little recreation on the street and exercise my fast horses," the Senator is paired with him. If it is a duty that a Senator shall vote at all times, the Senator may excuse himself only from voting when some great occasion demanded the absence of some Senator, like sickness or death in his family, or some thing of that kind, but if he is correct technically, even then he could not do so.

What do our pairs rest upon? Upon our right to withhold our votes whenever we think best. There is no warrant in the Constitution for a pair. There is no warrant in the rules for a pair. And yet, if a Senator was brought up to give his reasons why he had not voted, the Senate would never think of complaining if he should say, "I am paired." That is enough. He exercises his judgment when to pair. Would the Senate say, "You ought not to have paired?" That was never heard of. Senators pair on their own judgment.

As I was saying, these Senators that night declined to vote.

Mr. Conkling, who had as high a sense of duty, I think, as any man here in this Chamber, would make a motion and then sit in his seat without voting. Mr. Carpenter, who was one of the great constitutional lawyers of this country, would do the same thing. Mr. Blaine on that occasion inquired of the Presiding Officer, "Have I a right to vote?" The Presiding Officer said he had. Mr. Blaine said, "I will exercise the privilege of not voting," and he did not vote, and nobody then thought that those Senators were guilty of a breach of the privilege of the Senate to an extent that they were liable to be expelled or censured.

I am told—I do not know exactly whether it is true or not—that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Dubois], who has been singled out here and selected as the target of attack, because he did not out here and selected as the target of attack, because he did not vote, has two refusals of the Senate on record against excusing him, and when we get through with this question then he is to be brought to the bar of the Senate to be dealt with because of his refusal to vote. Possibly that is correct. Possibly it is not. Mr. Thurman, though then President pro tempore of the Senate, seems to have been Presiding Officer part of the time and to have come down out of the chair and taken part in the controversy on the floor of the Senate. Now, I read for the benefit of some of the Senators who want to know whether he had ever declined to vote, what Mr. Thurman said:

Upon the point of order raised by my friend from Alabama-

I think that was Mr. Houston— Mr. ALDRICH. What is the date? Mr. TELLER. May 18, 1879.

Upon the point of order raised by my friend from Alabama, or my friend from Wiscousin, it seems to me that a majority of those present may vote down the order to request the attendance of absent Senators on a direct

I am not certain whether this was given from the Chair or from the floor.

They may do the same thing by laying the motion on the table. I do not think, therefore, the point of my friend from Alabama is well taken upon

But that does not reach the difficulty at all. It is not the fact that there is not a quorum present. There is a quorum present. Then comes the question, what are you to do when a quorum does not vote? When Senators it in their seats and do not vote, what are you going to do then? In order to provide for that case Rules XVI and XVII were adopted by the Senate, Mr. President, perhaps I ought to make a confession. A confession, it is said, is sometimes good for the soul. I do not know but that it was some rather contumacious conduct of mine some years ago that gave rise to Rule XVII as it now stands, when there were but 7 or 8 Democrats in the Senate and sixty-odd Republicans. We would sit here night after night (I do not mean successive nights, but again and again), 6 or 7 or 8 Democrats, who by our presence made a quorum, when a majority of the sixty-odd Republican Senators had gone to their beds. We got tired of it one night and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Bayard], the former Senator from California [Mr. Casserly], and myself refused to vote. We sat in our seats around there in the northwest corner and refused to vote when our names were called. The Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] rose in his place and called attention to the fact that we three had declined to vote. Had we voted there would have been a quorum; not voting there was not a quorum. The Senator from Delaware rose and inquired of the Chair whether under the rules it was his duty to vote. The Chair reptied that in his opinion it was, and the Senator from Delaware thereupon voted.

Mr. Bayard now speaks up and says:

Mr. Bayard now speaks up and says:

I said I would not disober the rule of the Sonate.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, the Senator said he would not disober the rule of the Senate, however hard he thoughtit to be. My somewhat gallant Irish friend, Mr. Casserly, and I were obstinate and did not vote. We wanted to know what was to be done with us, and we did not vote. In the mean time the messengers went out. A quorum came into the Senate and nothing further was said upon the subject; the bill was passed, and there was an end of it.

Then he goes on:

That called attention to the matter, because Senators began to reflect upon and ask, "Is there any way of compelling a Senator to vote?" How can ou compel a Senator to vote? You may censure him for not voting; in an ttreme case you may expel him for not voting, perhaps, if you first pre-tribe a rule that he shall be subject to expulsion for not voting.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this:

You may censure him for not voting; in an extreme case you may expei him for not voting, perhaps, if you first prescribe a rule that he shall be subject to expulsion for not voting. It is not very well to make the law and the sentence in the same breath. If you have prescribed by a rule that a Senator who contumaciously refuses to vote shall be subject to expulsion if that would be a constitutional rule, then you may enforce it. But I thought then, and I think yet, I am free to say, that you must make your law before you give judgment under it.

So say we. There is no law in the Senate, no rule of the Sep-ate, which punishes a Senator for declining to vote or for declining to answer on a roll call; and I say here now as a lawyer that the Senate is powerless to make any law that shall be re-troactive and go back and punish that which occurred before they made the rule.

Mr. Thurman then reads the rule. I skip some things he said because they are not particularly pertinent. He reads the sixteenth rule.

When the yeas and mays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons be be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question.

And that was the old rule before this revision, and that was all before the

It was in 1871, I am told, that Mr. Thurman, then a Senator from Ohio, declined to vote-and then came the seventeenth rule, which is the new rule that was introduced to meet cases of such contumacious fellows as Casserly and I:

"When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign it cases therefor, and shall so assign them, the Presiding Officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: 'Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?' which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced; and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement."

Senator Thurman resumes:

Now observe, "when a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called," the sixteenth rule having declared that he shall vote unless he is excused, "shall be required to assign his reasons therefor" that is, his reasons for not voting—the first question that arises under this rule is, who is to require him to assign his reasons? Manifestly the President of the Senate has no right to do it, it seems to me. I should think it was a usurpation of power on the part of the President to demand of a Senator why he did not vote, and to assign his reasons. The requirement upon him to assign his reasons must be by a vote; and, mark, this rule applies to the case of a full Senate, where a quorum has voted—

Mr. Thurman is exactly in line with the point of order that I made the other day, which I believe was overruled by the Chair-

just as much as it does to a case where there is less than a quorum. There are 76 Senators now in this body. If 75 of them had voted and I had sat in his seat and not voted, a Senator might rise and move that that Senator be required to state the reasons why he did not vote: and having stated the reasons, then comes the duty of the Chair to submit the question. 'Shall the Senato', for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?' It is not aquestion about the waat of a quorum at all. It is a question about the performance of his duty by a Senator, his duty to vote. That is what this rule is.

Then Mr. Blaine made some suggestions which are not at all pertinent, except to say that he con tested the correct ruling of the Senator from Ohio. Then Mr. Thurman passed on to the further question:

So, Mr. President, upon that subject the question whether or not a Senator shall be required to state his reasons why he does not vote, is a matter to be determined by the Senate. But whether the Senator from Maine be right, or whether I be right, we have not still got to the chief difficulty, and I want to call the attention of my friends to it. Suppose you have gone through all that these rules require, and a Senator gives his reasons, and the Senate considers that those reasons are insufficient and refuse to excuse him, what then are you to do with that Senator? Can you without having previously provided, as the Constitution requires, any rule upon this subject, expel the Senator? What can you do in a case like that?

I say, Mr. President, that it does seem to me the case is perfectly clear. If the Senate must prescribe by rule what shall be the case that subjects them to the punishment, and what the punishment shall be. That has been my idea; that was my idea when I was in a little minority eight years ago and refused to vote. It is my idea still. It is not changed at all by the change in the majority of the Senate. I do not deny the power of the Senate to visit with penalities the refusal of a Senator sitting in his seat to vote.

Naithan do I Mr. President.

Neither do I, Mr. President.

Neither do I, Mr. President.

I can conceive a case in which a Senator might well be excused from voting, and I have no doubt that in every case in which he ought to be excused the Senate would have the justice to excuse him. I can conceive of plenty of cases in which he would not be excused at all, in which the course that he takes is not the course that in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution was the duty of an American Senate. That I can well enough conceive. But before you begin to visit penalties upon Senators for refusing to vote you must, in my judgment, prescribe the offense and prescribe the penalty. That is the way I look at it; and therefore I say to my friends hefe tonight, your rules are not such that you can compel these gentlemen to vote. You can not do it under the existing rules. You may censure them in your thought, in your judgment, in your speeches before the people. You may hold them up for the condemnation of the American people for sitting in their seats here and refusing to discharge that duty for which the States sent them here, and which the Constitution intended they should perform. You may do that; but when it comes to punishment, when it comes to visiting a judgment of censure or expulsion upon them, you must first make your law before you give judgment. fore you give judgment

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I Mr. PLATI. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I desire to know whether he indorses what I understand from the reading of the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Thurman, announced as his view of the case, namely, that until some rule has been made the Senate has no power of punishment.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly I do.

Mr. PLATT. I should like, then, upon this point to get his view. The Constitution prescribes that—

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds expel

I am not arguing whether this offense would constitute a ground of expulsion, but can it be true that the Senate can not expel a member for any offense unless that offense has been previously foreseen and provided in a rule as a ground of expulsion? the Senator hold to that view?

I do hold to that view, with this qualification, Mr. TELLER. that equity and justice require that before any man shall be punished for any crime he shall be notified what the character of the punishment is to be. That I understand to be a fundamen-tal law, not a statutory law, not a constitutional law, but a law that is older than constitutions and older than statutes.

Mr. PLATT. The Constitution— Mr. TELLER. Wait; I do not want to be interrupted now. If the Senate of the United States sees fit to expel a Senator, I do not know anyway that that Senator can have redress. If the Senate of the United States should determine to-day that there was a Democratic majority of two, and there should be caught here a Republican majority of two, because of the absence caught here a Republican majority of two, because of the absence of some Senators, and it should expel two Senators from this body to give the Republicans a majority, I do not know any method by which the expelled Senators could be returned to the body, except by reelection by their State Legislature, or appointment by the governor. I can not conceive, though, that any such thing could occur, any more than I can conceive that the highest tribunal of this land, the Supreme Court of the United States, should make an outrageous decision in violation of the very fundamental principles of law, and because there was no power to override it, it should exist. I could not imagine the Senate would do that thing; but if they should do it, it is the same with the Senate as with the court; nobody can review its action on that point.

Now, I will hear the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. The question is whether the power does not exist by reason of this clause of the Constitution independently exist by reason of this clause of the Constitution independently of any rule which the Senate may make. It is manifest that the Senate cannot, in making rules, provide for every occasion which might be thought to be ground for expulsion. Let me put a case which, of course, will be said to be an extreme case. Suppose some Senator should deliberately and profanely attack in language the presiding officer of the Senate, and continue it against remonstrance; that would be an offense.

Mr. TELLER. It would be disorderly behavior.

Mr. PLATT. But it is the same. The same law applies both to disorderly behavior and expulsion, it seems to me. There would be no rule against it as disorderly behavior. There would be no rule against it at all, because such a case might never have been foreseen.

Now, if the Senator will permit me a single word further, it seems to me that this is well provided for in the Constitution, and the Senate is left its judge as to whether it will punish a member for what shall be considered disorderly behavior, or for member for what shall be considered disorderly behavior, or for what offense it may expel a member.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will take the case of Kilbourn vs. Thompson he will see that the Supreme Court, so far as they had a right to say what we shall do in the matter, did not hold the view he takes. I do not think myself the Supreme Court could determine whether we could or could not expel a member. It is very apparent that the Supreme Court took the same view that Mr. Thurman took, which I have read.

Mr. PLATT. As I remember the case, it does not touch this

Mr. PLATT. As I remember the case, it does not touch this question.

Mr. TELLER. It does not touch this case, but it goes into the power of the other House, which is exactly the same as our supon that question.

I want to read a little further. I was interrupted by the Sena-I want to read a little further. I was interrupted by the Sena-tor from Connecticut. I read this because Senator Thurman was not only a great Senator, but he was a great lawyer. He had been a judge, and he was a man whose ability on questions of law, I think, was equal in this body to that of any man who had sat here for many years:

That is the view I have of it, and I should not think that any legislative body would be safe if it were otherwise. Having once been guilty myself perhaps makes me a little sensitive about it, but I would not like a bare majority of the Senate of the United States, in a case in which I felt that I was justified in the course that I took, to make the law and the punishment in the same breath. I do not think that would be right, sir.

Then he goes on to state how, ordinarily, the obstructive measures were pursued. He is now speaking of the minority of the Senate, and an exceedingly small minority, too small to call the

We talked upon the bill; we moved amendments to give us a chance to talk upon it, to get rid of the rule that said no Senator should speak more than twice on the same question; and we moved a still further amendment, and the Chair ruled, I remember extremely well, for it was on my motion, that that made a new subject and we might speak twice on that; that was allowing indefinite debate, and we talked, we talked against time, we talked in every way until we had exhausted ourselves and the patience of everybody else, and then the bill passed.

Now, in all this Mr. Thurman, then a Senator from Ohio, makes not the slightest suggestion of apology for what he had done. He does not seem to have regarded it as the Senator from Connecticut does, as such a penal offense. Then, going on and speaknecticut does, as such a penal offense. ing of this matter, he says:

But it is a mutter for every Senator to decide for himself.

I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to this for a moment, if he will listen:

But it is a matter for every Senator to decide for himself. He decides it on his responsibility to his own conscience and to his own constituents and to our common country. He must decide it for himself. All thave to say to my friends is, do what you will, enforce what rules you will, when you undertake to sit out a bill, it is simply a question of physical endurance, whether its passage is to be delayed by long speeches or by dilatory motions; try it any way you will, when you come to consider it, it is nothing but a question of physical endurance. If you have the endurance, well and good sit out the bill. If the other side, those who are opposed to the bill have more physical endurance than you have, they will defeat you. If not, you will defeat them.

Mr. STEWART. I inquire of the Senator from Colorado, if Senator Thurman made those remarks at the time he was of the majority?

Mr. TELLER. He made them at a time when he was of the majority, having been in the minority, as he said, for a good many years. He had on the previous 4th of March come into the majority. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] was also a member of the Senate at the same time and he recollects, perhaps, the occurrence. I think he was present that night.

Mr. President, I have mentioned these cases because I think they are vindications. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] has some others of the same character, which I will not detain the Senate to go over, because he desires to present them him-So I will content myself by saying as to those, while they did not fall under my immediate notice, not being present my-self, I have seen the same thing done repeatedly and I have never heard it complained of in the manner it is complained of

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said it was unusual and extraordinary, but evidently the Senator has not looked over the record, and at that time the Senator was Secretary of over the record, and at that time the Senator was Secretary of the Treasury and was not giving much attention to the proceedings here. But he said we have gone to an unusual length. That I deny. I deny that there has been any unusual performance in this matter. I do not say what there may be; I do not say what our rights are now. We may proceed further than we have done. If we are impressed with the idea that the interests of the people and the country are to be subserved by it, we shall underbidded of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if in his investigations of this matter he has ever discovered a case where a Senator was interrupted in the course of his speech and

Mr. TELLER. That night, if the Senator will look at the RECORD, there were roll calls to ascertain the presence of a quorum. I do not know whether the Senator on the floor when a call was made was absolutely opening his mouth to speak.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very point. That is the point
I wish to call attention to, not as a reproach to any one; but was it ever the practice of the Senate to arrest a Senator while speaking, either with or without his consent, and call for a quorum

I can not say as to that, but there is really no

Mr. TELLER. I can not say as to that, but there is really no point in it. It is the constitutional right of any Senator to have a quorum. That he has a right to have, and no Senator can take the floor and do business here, which is speaking, without a quorum if any Senator in this body objects. He can not do it. You can not do any kind of business without a quorum.

Mr. PLATT. Can we not hear speeches without a quorum?

Mr. TELLER. We can not hear speeches, because that is business; because the man who makes the speech is an actor. It is not probably the case that Senators who sit by are actors; they do not listen, but the speaker speaks all the same, and then it is business he is doing.

Now, I repeat, it does not make any difference; the Senator

Now, I repeat, it does not make any difference; the Senator may be taken off the floor. It may not be courteous to him; it will depend exactly on the mind of the Senator who was on the floor. If it should break into a sentence it might be discourteous. If he will wait until the Senator has concluded it is not discourteous. the will wait until the Senator has concluded it is not discour-teous, and sometimes the Senator on the floor might be in per-fect sympathy with the call for a quorum; he might desire to have an audience. There is not anything in the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio as to its being a violation of the rules, and that it is unusual, which I do not think the case. I think I have seen it done in the midst of speeches, although I did not look with reference to that particularly.

Now, Mr. President, this question is a question, I repeat, of sufficient importance to justify me in the course I have pursued, and that is enough for me. I do not tie my conscience to the Senator from Connecticut, and I do not know but that I have as much respect for majorities as the Senator from Connecticut. I have always yielded to majorities, and I believe in yielding to majorities. I believe the majority must in the end win. I have never been in favor of any kind of legislation that throttled the majority. I have never been in favor of any kind of legislation that cave the minority any unque advantage. No vote of minority any unque advantage. majority. I have never been in layer of any kind of legislation that gave the minority any undue advantage. No vote of mine has ever been given here in favor of enabling the minority to throttle the majority at the polls or anywhere else. But I do not regard it as the duty of a Senator here, because there is a majority in this Chamber in favor of a proposition, to say, "We must pass it because we have a majority, and we must pass it now.

I am to be the judge when I am ready to let it pass. Just as the Senator from Delaware said, some of the grandest achievements in parliamentary history have come from contests made by minorities. The greatest service that has been rendered to the human race has been rendered sometimes by minorities. Majorities are cruel and wicked and often more apt to be wrong Majorities are cruei and wicked and often more apt to be wrong than intelligent minorities. Because the great mass of the people in a State go one way it does not follow that it is right, but, there being no other way by which we can carry on the Government, we are compelled to let them go as if it was right; that is, if the majority of the voters want free trade, it does not follow that I should believe free trade is proper. If the majority vote that they want a protective tariff, it does not follow that the people who believe otherwise shall accept that as the right thing todo. But after proper debate, after proper considerright the people who believe otherwise shall accept that as the right thing to do. But, after proper debate, after proper consideration, the time comes when the majority are to act. The majority always have acted and always will. No man can say they shall act at this session. The minority have a right to say, "You shall not do it at this time; you do not come here representing the public; the people are not behind you; wait." The minority have a right to do that.

Take the custom in England? The House of Lords is unlike this body. The House of Lords practically registers the edict of the House of Commons. The House of Lords have the negaof the House of Commons. The House of Lords have the negative on a bill when the bill comes there, as they did with home rule bill when the other week, by a tremendous majority, they declared it should not pass. They said they did not believe public sentiment was back of the House of Commons:

believe public sentiment was back of the House of Commons; they did not believe the people of Great Britain wanted to inaugurate the system that Gladstone had been forcing, as they said, upon the House by the aid of Irish votes; and so they resisted it. It is everywhere agreed now that if, after the next election, the new House of Commons should repeat that bill, then the House of Lords would say, "That is evidence now that the people of Great Britain want it," and then they would yield. So say we. Go to the people with this question. Take the public sentiment on it, and if they elect a House of Representatives and the third of the Senate that is to be elected at the next election, then we will surrender; we will give up. We insist that you have not had the expression of the people. We insist that the great majority of the people of the United States are opposed to this proposed legislation. We say that the wage-earners everywhere in the United States are in arms against it; that the productive forces, outnumbering the money-lenders a that the productive forces, outnumbering the money-lenders a hundred to one, are opposed to it. We say that the great banks have in certain places created public sentiment. They have handred to one, are opposed to it. We say that the great banks have in certain places created public sentiment. They have taken, as I said once before, the business enterprises of the country by the throatand they have said to them, "You favor repeal or you will get no accommodation at the bank." They have done that in some sections of the United States, and they are doing it to-day. With more money than they had last winter in their banks, with their loans reduced and their cash increased, they are declining to lend money all over the country for the avowed purpose, the undisguised purpose, of compelling legislation here according to their wishes.

And so we may say they have taken the merchants and the manufacturers by the throat and said, "Now, you appeal to your representatives to repeal this bill or you will go into bankruptcy," and they appeal to us, not because they represent the people or because they will it, but because these agencies have them where they compel them to do it. You have not consulted the great laboring interests of the country—the men who work in mills, the men who work in manufactories, the men who work on farms have not been heard. Submit it to them.

You have had petitions here. I saw in the paper the other day that a petition had come here for repeal, and that it represented that a petition had come to the state of the

who have not a dollar back of them and a hundred men who have $350,000,000 back of them? If I listened to the voice of either it would be to the voice of the poverty-stricken supplicants and petitioners and not the aristocrat and millionaire. The latter will take care of themselves. They do not need any help. But it is the industries of the country that are threatened. It is the people who labor we are concerned in.

It will not do for the Senator from Ohio to say that this is not a demonetization scheme. It will not do for anybody to say that this not a complete recognition of the act of 1873 demonetizing silver, because it leaves not a single provision of law for the further use of silver as money. It wipes out every statute that recognizes silver as new money hereafter. It is an absolute demonetization; and when I take up another branch of this case (I do not care about doing it now) I will produce to the Senate the declaration of people in this country and in Europe, high in authority, who recognize this as a complete destruction of silver as money. I said the other day it would not disappear from our currency to-day, or to-morrow, or in a year, or perhaps not in ten years; but it is as inevitable that it goes out of the currency in time as it is that you repeal this law, unless there comessome other legislation that shall keep silver in the currency system of the United States.

The next movement will be when silver money is no longer being added to, when there is no statute that recognizes it, it will be discredited. I have a letter, which I received this morning, stating—I do not know whether truthfully or not—that the great banks of New York City, Chicago, and some other cities had determined to receive no silver certificates or silver dollars on deposit. That will be the next move when they have got rid of the law of 1890, if they do get rid of it. Then it will be discredited money. Then it will be representative money, and then we shall be asked to issue bonds to redeem it: and then you will hear talk about an honest dollar and a stable dollar; that gold is the only stable money, with an appreciation that can not be questioned of more than 45 per cent in seventeen years, with an appreciation that is charged here, which if any man disputes he simply shows his ignorance of the condition of the world if he says that gold has not appreciated.

That I will touch on at a later time when I take up another branch of this subject, which seems to me to be more pertinent than it is to discuss it now. I am only referring to it now to show the importance of this question. It is no trifling action that the Senate is asked to take. It is not a question whether we shall drop out of the money system of the United States silver as standard money. The question presented is whether we shall decrease the price of all American products, with wheat at 40 cents a bushel in the West now, and it will be less than that if this bill passes. It is whether we shall enter upon an era of money contraction, as said by the Senator from Nevada, with a growing population, with a growing business; whether we shall keep the supply growing with the business demands, and with the growth of commerce, trade, and population.

Can there be anything more important presented to the Ameri-

Can there be anything more important presented to the American people? Has there been anything more important presented to the American people in a generation? In my judgment it outweighs anything that has come here since the settlement of the question whether our flag should float over all the country or only a part of it. I doubt, in fact, whether it is in any degree beneath that in its importance to the American people. I said the other day that it was not inferior to the question whether the black man should be or should not be a slave. It is a question whether the productive agencies of the country can be maintained at a rate that will give to the agents of production a sufficiency of pay, a sufficiency of compensation to enable them to keep themselves in the position that they have been kept under our system of finance for the last twenty-five years.

The Senator from Delaware said that wages were not reduced. Mr. President, when I take up the other branch of the case I shall show to Senators here that wages all over the world are on the decline, in Great Britain and in all parts of Europe and in this country; that since we have been debating this question in this Chamber there has been a fall in the wages of American labor in every part of the United States, and in some parts very much more severe than in others. I do not say that it is wholly and entirely due to this threat, but in my judgment it is largely due to it; and because I believe that this measure is fraught with such evil, I said the other day I should leave no obstructive tactics placed in my hands unused to defeat at the present time the passage of the pending bill, at least until public opinion can be taken and presented to us. I will not trust the great metropolitan press, nor will I trust the bankers' associations nor the chambers of commerce; I want to hear from the people through the ballot box, and when I have heard from them that way, I will yield my judgment to theirs, and I shall not yield it until I do.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, seldom during the present session, that has now been prolonged, have I ventured to occupy the attention of the Senate for even a moment, and I would not now undertake to do so but for the fact that I think the gentlemen who agree with me on this question have been put in a false position by those who have urged the Senate in an impatient manner to come to an immediate vote. As for myself I will say that I have neither made nor voted for any dilatory motion, nor is it my purpose to engage in efforts to prevent the Senate from coming to a conclusion upon the pending measure. In my judgment, those who call themselves the majority are more responsible for the delays which have occurred than those whom they describe as the minority.

In the first place, Mr. President, it is by no means certain that a majority of this body is either for or against the pending measure. The pending measure is called a bill for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law; but it is not a bill for the repeal of the Sherman law, nor is it a bill for the repeal of the Sherman law which it concerns. Unconditionally a repeal of the Sherman law, as has been pointed out by other Senators—the idea is by no means original with me—would involve of necessity the substitution of some other law to take its place, and when the national Democracy, in convention assembled, called for the repeal of that system of money which had been given to the country by the Sherman law in its entirety they interpreted what they meant by that in the next breath by pointing out the substitute they intended to take its place. So the pending measure is not only a contradiction of the terms of the professed judgment of the national Democracy, but it is an evasion even of the interpretation which the interpreters have since put upon it.

I do not think that the Senate has been treated fairly by those outside of this body who demand an instant conclusion upon this subject, nor by some who are in it. It has been my observation that those who have talked most, in such forms of communication to the American people as seemed fit to them, have been the very ones who have urged upon Senators who have the responsibility of action not to talk at all. They seem to be content to monopolize the debate as well as judgment as to what should be its conclusion. I will take, for example without being invidious by pointing out any particular journal, some of the journals somewhere in this country. They have occupied columns, pages, every day for so that days in discoursing upon their views of the subject, while they are not responsible for its conclusion; and they manifest great impatience that a Senator should occupy a few hours.

Gentlemen upon the floor here who are most impatient for a vote have occupied a great deal of time in preventing it, notably the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dolph], who has now hung up the Senate for two days by a motion which, whether dilatory in its parliamentary description or not, was necessarily dilatory in its effect. Yet he insists that we shall come to an immediate vote, and is content to occupy the attention of the Senate only with three or four speeches of his own, but by interjecting into the body of the debate a partisan ruling in an attempt to correct the Journal, which he knows is of such a delicate character that it would consume perhaps as much time as the debate itself if he were to insist upon bringing it to a conclusion.

if he were to insist upon bringing it to a conclusion.

And my friend from New York [Mr. Hill], who represents a constituency which perhaps is more eager for a conclusion than any other constituency represented in this body, proposes right in the midst of the debate to amend the rules, which he knows in the nature of things is just as important a measure as the determination of this issue, and would lead to longer and more protracted debate than the pending question if it were pursued and pushed in dead earnest to produce a conclusion here.

Mr. President, it is not yet known how the majority of this body stand. Repeating for myself my willingness and desire that it shall proceed with this debate as with all other debates, and that it shall consider each amendment which is proposed to the bill in an orderly way, without having that amendment laid on the table through the agency of any opponent, and then reach its conclusions, I advert for a moment to the addresses which were made to us on yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

The Senator from Ohio tells us, lecturing the Democratic party, of which he appears upon this floor now as not only the leader but the lecturer, that—

In times past, when they were in the minority and we were in the majority, we never shrank from responsibility. We were Republicans because we believed in Republican principles and Republican men and Republican measures, and whenever a question came into the Senate Chamber to be decided, we never pleaded the baby act and said "we could not agree." We met to gether in conclave: we measured each other's opinions, some giving way, and finally we came to an agreement. In this way we passed all the great laws which have marked the history of the last thirty years of our country, and it was not done by begging votes of the other side. We knew that, by the usual and almost unive sol habit of the Democratic party, they would oppose anything we should propose, even the Lord's Commandments or the

The Senator is entirely right about that, because if we found The Senator is entirely right about that, because it we found those ancient and venerated documents proposed by the Senator from Ohio we would imagine instantly that there was just such a trick about it as there was in the Sherman law. I beg pardon for using the word "trick;" I do not think that is parliamentary, just such a scheme as there was in the Sherman law, to pre tend to be for the coinage of silver and to be at the same time an act for the depletion of the Treasury of gold to pay silver

The speech of the Senator from Texas was along in the same line. I beg leave for my part to say to both gentlemen, who now seem to be singularly concurrent in all their opinions, that I do not think the lecture to Democracy is entirely misplaced. not think the lecture to Democracy is entirely misplaged. This is a free country and it is the privilege of every citizen to belong to any political party that he pleases. It is his duty in my judgment, as long as he does belong to a political party, to accept its judgments upon public questions which are submitted to it for a declaration of its policy thereupon.

Now, then, I wish to say to the Senator from Texas that I for one am ready, and I believe a majority of those who agree with me are ready, to-day, to-night, to-morrow, instantly to submit these questions to a majority of the Democrats who have been sent here charged with this responsibility, and I for one, how-ever much it may be against the grain, will submit to the deter-mination of the majority of my own party and take what comes. I do not see the Senator from Texas in his seat.

Mr. MILLS. Here I am.
Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator is ready to do that he can bring the Democratic party together without shedding tears over it in the Senate Chamber, because it is not together. Is the Senator from Texas ready to go into conclave with his Democratic brethfrom Texas ready to go into conclave with his Democratic breth-ren and abide the issue? I can ask questions of others, but I can not answer. I am ready. I will take the chances, and what-ever may be the judgment of that great national party here in the Senate, which I believe ought to keep the responsibility of this and all legislation, and of which I am an humble part, I do not shrink; I will abide that judgment, and look to the future to repair it if, in my belief, it is erroneous.

Now, Mr. President, it is upon another point I wish to address myself in a few remarks, to the argument which the Senator from Texas made yesterday respecting the rules of this body. From those who deprecate any, the least invasion of the rules of this body and from those who insist that the debate upon the pending measure shall be suspended in order to enforce them, I little expected to hear the revolutionary doctrine uttered that the rules out to be set aside and a revolution effected in the Senate by the so-called or assumed authority.

The Senator quotes the declaration of Thomas Jefferson that the decisions of a majority ought to be instantly acquiesced in. I accept that. I am ready to submit to the decree of a majority of my party. Is the Senator from Texas? I am ready to submit to a decree of a majority of the Senate as soon as it utters its decision; but that decision must be uttered by the Senate itself respecting the rules which it seeks to invoke

The Senator from Texas yesterday addressed this argument to the Senate. Said he, the Constitution has empowered the Senate to make rules. That power is continuous. It exists now as well as it existed in the beginning; it has existed all along: and the Senate has as much power now to make rules as it ever had. So it has. That is uttering an axiomatic doctrine which

But the deduction which the Senator from Texas draws from that doctrine is the one which it seems to me is entirely erroneous. Because the Senate can make rules it does not follow that it can violate rules when made. To illustrate this by analogy, let me put in argumentative form an interrogatory to the Senator, or whoever may meet it. There is no question about the fact that the people of the United States have the right to make a constitution. They have as much right to-day to make a constitution as they had when they first declared their independence. Their right to make a constitution is continuous, perpetual, and can never be intercepted, for the very genius of our idea of free government is that the people were sovereign in the beginning and are entitled by the laws of God and nature and man to be sovereign all the time.

Now, will the Senator say that because the people of the United States are sovereign, and will he say that because they have the power to make a Constitution, they have therefore by a majority the right to violate the Constitution which they have made and to ignore the oaths which they have taken in common to support it? On the contrary, has not that Constitution by the decree of the majority of the American people provided by what methods, at what times, and under what circumstances the peo-ple may exercise their right of sovereignty to amend it: and can any number of men, be they millions or be they two-thirds majority, just by their ipse dixit, upon the spur of the moment, say, "We wipe out this Constitution," because all the people have a right to amend it if they will? Are they not bound by their compact, just as binding upon the majority as upon the minority, to proceed only in that way which they themselves ordinal and exitent here they have the different bed that they have they have the different bed that they have the different bed that they have the have they dained and set forth beforehand as the only method that can be constitutionally followed?

Now, the rules of the Senate, when they have been made, are just as binding as the Constitution of the United States; for that is only a fundamental law in accordance with which all other laws must conform

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator yield?
Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.
Mr. HILL. Let me put to the Senator this question: If when the first Congress convened the Senate had adopted a code of rules which provided that the rules should not thereafter be changed without the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, would those rules have been constitutional? I can ask questions. Will the Senator answer them?

Mr. DANIEL. Undoubtedly I will answer; but I did not like to interrupt the Senator while he was upon his feet. I can not only answer it, but I can be courteous.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is always courteous, and I hope he will not suppose that I am discourteous.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not esteem that the Senator is. I was merely waiting for the Senator to get through. I am not prepared to answer that question offhand.

Mr. HILL. The Senator can take all the time he pleases. Mr. HILL. The senator can take all the time he pleases.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, I shall, without permission. I do not like to commit myself upon an exceptional state of things when I have no such question presented to me. I may not be a very good lawyer, but I am too good a one to answer hastily a proposition which I am not discussing and which has nothing to do with the point I am discussing. with the point I am discussing. It may be that a majority in that instance could rule the Senate, because a majority in contemplation of parliamentary law is the Senate; and a majority at one time can not bind a majority at another time, because the majority is the oracle of the Senate, but in being the oracle of the Senate, it can only proceed in that form which has been or-dained for the expression of its voice. The question does not reach the one which we have now under advisement. You can not tie the hands of future generations by accumulating difficul-ties as to the expression of their wish, but you can devise the form and manner in which they, the majority, shall give utterance to their sentiments.

Now, I can not only answer questions, but if the Senator was upon his feet I would ask him, does he not think that the rules of the Senate are binding now? We have made no such exceptional rule as he contemplates in order to twist off from the main track of the discussion. Does he not believe that the rules of the Senate are binding now?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the rules of the Senate are binding, ectirely so, in regard to all the ordinary methods of procedure. Upon the question of the right to change the rules, the Senate can not bind itself. To further illustrate what I mean, let me give an illustration a little different from what I gave a moment ago. The first Congress meets, and the Senate passes a code of rules which provide that they shall not be changed if the Sena-tors object. I did not hear the whole of the remarks of my dis-tinguished friend from Virginia. I think he talked around the subject somewhat; but still the fair inference from his remarks may be drawn that he would think that such a code of rules would be unconstitutional. Am I right?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Now, my point is just here. Both the instances which I gave were plain, clear, certain violations of the Constitution. A majority of the Senate has a right at any time to change the rules. Now, these old rules, established at the beginning of the century, have come down to us. They have not provided in just so many words in hac verba the point which I presented; but they have in substance and effect. They have been so framed that they do give, if the arguments which have been presented here day after day are true, a minority power to prevent a majority from the passage of a bill. Therefore, I say they are just as nugatory upon this body as though they had ex pressly determined the number of the majority who could prevent the passage of a bill.

I say that the power which made the rules can change them. The power to legislate is given by the Constitution. The Senate can frame no set of rules, no matter how ingenious may be the devices, no matter whether there is a specific number specified which requires assent for their amendment—you can not bind this body so that we can not carry out the other provisions of the Constitution which are that this body must legis-

If the Senator will indulge me a moment more, because I do not propose to interrupt him again, no matter what he may say upon this subject, I will state that he did me some injustice when he first began his remarks by saying that by my interject-ing in this discussion a proposition for a change of the rules thereby I had in some manner delayed the final vote upon the pending bill. Sir, that was not my intention. He is right in saying that the people whom I in part have the honor to represent on this floor are vitally interested in the passage of this bill. The industries of my State are paralyzed; our finances are disorganized; the sentiment of my State in favor of the passage of this bill is well nigh unanimous. The last thing I would do would be to interpose any obstacle that might prevent a final vote

I suggested an amendment which provided that after thirty days had been given to the pending bill, or any other bill, the Senate should have a right to say in all its majesty and power, under the authority of the Constitution, that this debate should stop, and by my amendment of that rule I sought to bring this question to a final solution. I did not intend to delay a vote; and, sir, if the Presiding Officer of this body and forty-three Senators agree with me, this bill can be passed in spite of the obstructions of any minority. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remind the occupants of the galleries that applause will not be tolerated. It is a violation of the rules of the Senate. Persons who are guilty of such a violation of the rules of the Senate are liable to be expelled from the galleries. The Senator from Virginia will

Mr. DANIEL. Gentlemen who are very impatient if anyone else ventures to discuss finance in this body can not even discuss their own motions to amend the rules without giving us at some length their views upon the subject. The Senator has made a speech upon finance in which he has talked all around from my question and has retired from the body without answering it.
That was not the way in which I treated him, although I did not conceive that it bore upon this question.
I asked him the question whether or not the rules of the Senate were binding upon the Senate; and in reply he debutes all around the gooseberry bush without answering the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.
Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question which, in my opinion, goes to the very essence of the matter now under consideration. Does the Senator because of the matter now under consideration. lieve that, under our rules, there is any method by which a majority of the Senate can reach a determination upon a question to amend its rules in the face of obstructive tactics on the part to amend its rules in the face of obstructive factics on the part of a minority whether by speeches or otherwise?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not see that the rules have provided for that contingency; but my reply to the Senator would be broader and more comprehensive than anything involved in his question, for it has not been three days since I heard that Senator declare upon this floor that the Senate had never refused to carry out the wishes of a majority; and it is, in my judgment, a full and complete answer that no such condition has arisen in the Senate as that contamplated by those who are making dilathe Senate as that contemplated by those who are making dilatory motions and great ado about the rules.

There are not, as I believe, in the party which is charged with the responsibility of legislation, a majority in favor of the unconditional repeal of this measure, and my judgment to this effect is intensified by the fact that some Senators who are said to be in the majority and undertake to lecture their fellows, avoid bringing the question to a test, though they have the pledge of their fellows that they will abide the result, if such is obtained.

Mr. President, an extraordinary view has been taken of this question by all who have endeavored to scare and guy the Senate into instantaction. They have assumed that Senators here who have announced themselves against unconditional repeal do not represent their constituents. It has been charged with respect to myself, by those who do not live in my State, that I do not represent the people of Virginia. I was born and reared amongst that people, and I should not be willing to occupy my seathere if I did not believe that I fairly, honestly, and justly represented them. I have lived amongst them all my life. In their sedate moments, when they have given their judgment upon this financial question, they have given it in the form which I am here to interpret as best I may. We have a governor of Virginia to-day who was nominated and elected upon a platform which declared for the free coinage of silver. Do not our public men who represent us vote for it every time they get a chance? In the convention which sent delegates to the national convention, which nominated the gentleman who is now President of the United States for his office, that question was tested and was decided in the same form that I am here to stand for as best I may for as best I may.

Mr. President, it is complete assumption upon the part of gentlemen who have volunteered to lecture their fellows, and who have consumed time in debate which they might well have given to the solution of the pending question, that they are either a majority of their party, or a majority of this body.

From the foundation of this Government over one hundred years are until to day, the Senate has never refused to respond to a ago, until to-day, the Senate has never refused to respond to a fairly expressed and deliberate public sentiment. It did not do so in the period of the war, it has never done so since, but it has been through the process of debate that that public sentiment has been collected, and defined, and instructed.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] was one of the champions of the so-called Federal elections bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator will excuse me. course of the debate upon that subject said one word upon the question in the Senate. I was the champion, or the advocate rather, of a change in the Senate rules which would allow the majority of the Senate to transact the business which it was necessary should be transacted, and I occupy the same position to-day. Mr. DANIEL. Why did the Senator recommend this change to let the majority express itself when he said just now the majority was against him? There has been an illumination in the Senator's mind through the process of the debate on the Federalelections bill. Why does he appeal to the Senate to let the side upon which he stood express itself, when he proclaims that he was in the minority? It seems to me that he was the champion of the minority, and not of the majority.

The so-called minority did not ask him to be their champion.

The so-called minority did not ask him to be their champion. They found a method of expressing themselves until they grew into a majority; and I beg leave to say to the Senator that in our republican form of government majorities are not fixed things of iron or stone which endure in all weathers. They are ambulatory and shifting, and the man who says "I am in the majority to-day" may be in the minority to-morrow. It is by the process of free debate, by that process which the sacred them is the process of the sacred that it is not that it is no ideal my friend from Texas commends, by the process of the idea of Jefferson, that error ceases to be dangerous when truth is free to combat it, that you finally get at the right and just

There have been great changes of sentiment in this country since this debate opened. There are very few people in this country now who attribute our present trouble to the Sherman act, except in a minor and subsidiary degree. It is a most curious thing that a minority of Democrats upon this side of the Chamher, as I believe them to be, and perhaps a majority of Republicans upon the other side of the Chamber are concurring, but upon two completely opposite theories of action. The Republicans, the ancient and hereditary foes of the money of the people, are only pursuing the genius of their long-time advocacy of a contracted currency, and are infavor of destroying the Sherman law because it gives the people some two or three millions of new currency a month. Some of the Democrats are in favor of repeal because of peculiar conditions which surround them; but I know of only one who has announced in the Senate that he between the conditions which surround them. Heves the present panic was caused by the Sherman law. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] ridicules the idea that the Sherman law is the cause of this panic. The great Republican snerman law is the cause of this panic. The great Republican party of New York met in that State a few days ago, and a distinguished publicist of New York City addressed the convention and ridiculed the idea that the Sherman law was the cause of the panic, and yet he is one of the most powerful advocates of its repeal

If the Sherman law is not the cause of the panic, and is not disturbing our finances, as is pretended in some quarters, why is it that the Republican party have so quickly ranged them-selves to destroy their own legislation? Can it be for any other selves to destroy their own legislation? Can it be for any other reason than that they were insincere in it when it was passed, and that they acknowledge that it is "the makeshift" which it is now generally conceded to have been.

Mr. President, to recur to the rules of this body—
Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator for one minute?
Mr. DANIZL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANULL. Yes, sir.
Mr. BUTLER. Rule XL reads as follows:

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule with the contraction of the senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule with the senate of the senat

I should like to ascertain from the Senator from Virginia if the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas insist that the Senate has a right to disregard that rule in making amendments to our rules? Is that what I understand to be the position of the Senator from New York and the Senator from

Mr. DANIEL. I had the rules of the Senate before me and was about to address myself to the ideas which have been very properly called to my attention by the Senator from South

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I will venture to trespass Mr. VOOTHEELS. Mr. President, I will venture to trespass on the kindness of the Senator from Virginia to do what I have been desiring an opportunity to do all day. I rise to a question of personal privilege and ask the Secretary to read the article I send to the desk. It was published in this morning's Washington Post.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as re-

The Secretary read as follows:

MR. VOORHERS STILL HOPEFUL.

At the meeting of the Senate Finance Committee yesterday morning Mr. VOCHHEES took occasion to put into words what has been believed to be the attitude of the President for some days past. He said—and made no concealment of the fact that he spoke by authority—that there could be no compromise in which either himself or the Administration could be considered as a factor. The Administration, continued Mr. VOCHHEES, was urging a contest for a great principle, and would not give one inch, even if the Senate was kept here week in and week out.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is simply necessary for me to say only a word, that there is not one single word of truth in that statement. There was no conversation of that kind in the Commitment. The on Finance, no expression of that sort on my part, or on the part of anybody else. The position of the Administration was not discussed, nor did I attempt to outline it. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was present in the committee room, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] was present, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was present, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson] was present, as was also the Senator from lowa [Mr. Allison]. There was no such conversation at all, and the publication is a pure figment of the imagination.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. TELLER. If I may be allowed to say a word, my attention was attracted to the article which the Senator from Indiana has caused to be read, but I took pains to find out that there was no truth in it, and so I did not use it. I am satisfied the statement in the newspaper article is incorrect.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I look upon such suggestions as have been made by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New York as most unfortunate. I am inclined to think that the Senator from Texas has been rather hasty and inconsiderate in his utterances, for he is so distinguished a champion of free debate and has made so great a history in defending the prerogative of the people's representatives in legislative chambers, that I am inclined to pass over his hasty expression of yesterday as a Homeric nod. A disciple of Jefferson, who sug-gests to the Senate that it is not bound by its own solemn rules of action does no honor to his teacher.

The true definition of the law is that it is a rule of action.

The thing which a student of law learns when he first turns over the pages of Blackstone and Kent is that law is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in a State, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. To speak of rule and to speak of law, so far as their binding force is concerned, is to speak of synonyms. Mr. President, this is a land of order and a land of law. The Democratic party, as I am proud to believe, will ever be a party of law and a party of order, which will face every contingency it has to confront, and will abide the result as the authority of law shall decree. I see in the Constitution, to begin with, that to the great bodies of legislation, the Senate and the House of Representatives, there is given this great prerogative:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

What do you mean by "determine?" You mean fix, declare, ordsin, and settle. What do you mean by "rule of procedure," except a law of conduct which binds every member of a body with all the force which the Constitution of his country can place upon it in sanction of his right to sit in it. It is needless for any astute dialectician to go off with any nice, sharp quillets of the law, as the Senator from New York has done, by asking me such a question as the supposition that a majority might have said that not less than two-thirds could change the rules

A court might hold that unconstitutional in that the majority had thus deprived itself as a depositary of the right to act, not referring to the forms of its procedure, for that is not a form of procedure, that is a declaration of what may be a quorum to proceed in any form; and the majority being made a quorum by natural law and by necessary constitutional construction, it would have exceeded its power if it were to repose that power in other than a majority. So we are not discussing who in the Senate may be the depositary of power-it is the Senate-but in what form that depositary of power may proceed to express its decision. So I eliminate from this discussion completely the misleading, though artful suggestion of the Senator from New York, as one which does not refer to the integrity of this question. are not seeking to determine what constitutes a Senate or what constitutes a quorum—that is, in my line of argument, but in what manner that which does constitute the Senate or a quorum may proceed to deliver its views.

Mr. President, this Senate has provided how it may amend its rules. It can only be upon motion, and what I wish to ask of the Senator from New York, what I would ask of my friend from Texas, what I would ask of any body who has assumed the character of a revolutionist in this body, is this: Do the rules bind us until they are amended, and are they rules made in pursuance of the Constitution or not? It is a late day in the history of our Govconnects for a new practitioner to come to this bar and discover that the rules are not constitutional. We have had statesmen in this body, the most learned and luminous which the world has in its history, and they have never so contended. It is the invention of a new idea under a fictitious exigency, for there is no such exigency

Now, turning to the fortieth rule, to which my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] calls attention, I find that the form of procedure to change the rules is well provided, and if the Senator from Texas wants to change them, or the Senator from New York wants to change them, what method of knowledge has he as to what may be the majority judgment of this Chamber until he has invoked that judgment in constitutional form?

RULE XL.

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule VII

If these Senators want to change the rules the Constitution has given them the method. Unanimity may do it at any time. How would the majority proceed to change the rules in any other way? But one Senator can occupy the attention of the Chair at one time. He is not a majority; and when he sits down any other Senator has equal privilege. What right has he to assume that he is either in front of a majority or represents them until he has constitutional authority to do so by the record of its decision?

Mr. President, this debate discloses to me this fact: It revives the historic reminiscence, which is worthy of the traditions of this great body, that in all its history it has never declined or refused to register the public will. If some suppose that Senators here are not representing their people they must recognize that those Senators must be under the influence of some very deep and grave convictions if they thus imperil their acceptability to their own people in advocating an unpopular doctrine. I do not believe that such is the case, but if it be, those Senators must realize some very great conscientious sense of judgment.

Even if it had never been true in the past, in the notable instance which was before this body a few years ago it was illustrated that the Senate will always respond to public judgment; and if those who thought otherwise then are now foremost to declare that it did respond to public judgment, why should the argument and debate on this great question be interrupted by proaches of their fellows, by crimination and recrimination, by assumptions of superiority in patriotism and by revolutionary doctrines that all laws ought to go down to let the supposititious majority have its way?

It should be remembered that this debate has come up under the most extraordinary circumstances, and is upon the most important subject, in one sense, which the Senate has debated perhaps for generations. No national convention of any politi-cal organization in the United States, whether Democratic, Re-publican, Prohibition, third party, Populist, or what not, has ever demanded of its representatives the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law. That measure and its cognate branches, which run in all directions of finance, is now a subject which engages the attention of the whole civilized world, and all eyes are directed upon those who have to deal with it. The Senate can not deliberate in that just sense in which every man should keep his head cool and endeavor to fill himself with the high spirit of patriotism, with such angry speeches, reproaches, and recriminations on every hand, and with suggestions, such as those made by the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Texas, which alarm the law-abiding sense of this people as much as the proposed measure alarms those who look to their financial well-being.

Mr. President, it is my judgment now, and has been from the moment this session commenced, that if those who are primarily charged with our legislation would go to work to frame a meas which would carry out in its integrity the promises of the Democracy of this country to our people, they would find a much easier, quicker, and shorter road to a conclusion than by attempting to stand upon one splinter of the Democratic platform and ignore the residue of it.

Sir, the fact remains that both parties in this country have a responsibility in this matter. I do not exonerate the Republicans from responsibility, as some of my colleagues do. The Republican party in this country has a responsibility as well as we have, and one of the responsibilities which they assumed was that they would restore silver as standard money.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Sen ator from Maine?

Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.
Mr. FRYE. As I came into the Senate a moment ago I heard the Senator from Virginia alluding to the alarming and revolutionary statement of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], the Senator from New York [Mr. Hill], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. Mills]. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to interpose at this moment touching those very revolutionary statements, the opinion of the ablest parliamentarian ever in the United States, when he deliberately gave his mind to it, and gave a written opinion. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a deliberate, written opinion of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Forty-third Congress—Mr. James G. Blaine. I remember it well. He said:

The Chair has repeatedly ruled that pending a proposition to change the rules dilatory motions could not be entertained, and for this reason he has several times ruled that the right of each House to determine what shall be its rules is an organic right expressly given by the Constitution of the United States. The rules are the creature of that power, and of course they can not be used to destroy that power. The House is incapable by any form of rules of divesting itself of its inherent constitutional power to exercise its function to determine its own rules. Therefore, the Chair has always announced, upon a proposition to change the rules of the House, he would never entertain a dilatory motion.

Beyond that ruling neither of the revolutionary Senators went, and I think neither went up to it.

Mr. DANIEL. In reply to the Senator, I may say that I did not intend to apply to the Senator from Oregon the word "revolutionary." He has done nothing of that kind, nor made any suggestion of that kind. I thought his motion was in effect, though not in parliamentary description, dilatory. What I refer to as "revolutionary" is the suggestion of the idea around this side of the Chamber that some one in this body—it is not defined exactly who it is—has the right to subjugate whenever he thinks he is with the majority and to summon the majority he thinks he is with the majority and to summon the majority to help to do it.

I reply to the Senator from Maine that the precedent which he has quoted has no application here. It is coram non judice. This is not the House of Representatives. This is not a continuous is not the House of Representatives. This is not a continuous body. It commences each session without any rules, and in the absence of rules it must be governed by such general considerations as it may find best for itself. I have always understood, however—I may be misinformed—as part of the current history of the country, as I had believed it to be, that my distinguished friend from Texas had been one who even denied its application there and denounced the attempt to enforce it.

Be that as it may—for I am making no personal address, and do not desire to be personal in my remarks, further than to illustrate them with propriety—a precedent in the House of Rem trate them with propriety—a precedent in the House of Representatives has no application here, for that is a body different in its character, different in its continuity, and totally different in its parliamentary constitution and methods. The Senate, on the other hand, is a continuous body. You have no election for all Senators at one time. The Senate goes on from year to year, and may sit at a time when the House is not in session, does not sit, for it is a court as well as a coordinate branch of the Legislature, and it is part of the executive as well. All three powers of government are reposed in it in different degrees, shape, and forms. Perpetual, as it is, with a right to sit at any time, it is obliged to have rules, and when it has made those rules no man in a hundred years of our history has ever disputed or ignored their hinding force in any operative were their binding force in any operative way.

Mr. FRYE. If I do not interrupt, may I ask the Senator a

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; I have but a few more remarks to make, but I shall be glad to answer the Senator if I can.

Mr. FRYE. The power of the House of Representatives to make rules is derived from the same Constitution and in the same way that the power of the Senate is derived. There is no differ-The continuation of one body makes no difference whatever. It is a constitutional right given to the body itself. I have not a shadow of doubt but that it is the right of the Senate, under the Constitution of the United States, at any time it pleases, at any hour it p'eases, to make a rule for any case then pending before the Senate and it would become the duty of Presiding Officer, under his oath, to refuse to entertain any dilatory motion and to promptly stop any dilatory proceeding, thus preserving to this body the right which the Constitution gives it. If the majority had adopted a proceeding of that kind a control of the month ago, we should before this time have had a vote on this

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator and all the repealers had stayed here and shown their faith by their works, perhaps we might have had a vote on this bill. But I beg leave to call attention to the fact that the minority of this body has furnished quorums here, and that the so-called majority is a majority which does not fight and will not fight

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator's remark does not, as he ought to know, apply to me, for I have answered every roll call, night and day, that has been had in the Senate, and have not been absent for a single hour since I came here.

Mr. DANIEL. Then the remark does not apply to the Senator and I do not include him. I mean the Senators on his side, with whom he trains, impersonal to himself.

I beg leave to call further attention to the fact that while those of us who are not in favor of this bill have stayed here night after night, and day after day, there have hardly been five minutes at any time when the Senators who profess to be so eager for the passage of the bill have not gone out of the Chamber and then clamored about being unable to do anything. The fact is that those who would under some circumstances vote for unconditional repeal are not, in my judgment, heartily in favor of that as the best measure that could be adopted; they do not feel that the public sentiment of this country in its integrity, take it North, South, East, and West is for repeal; but only that certain sections are. All over the breadth of the United States, from Maine to Texas, and from California to Vigigia, there is a from Maine to Texas, and from California to Virginia, there is a powerful party who want to see the Senator's party carry out some of its pledges and the Democracy at the same time. I do not share with the Senator from Texas in his exoneration

I do not share with the Senator from Texas in his exoneration of the Republican party from its duty because that party is in the minority in the Senate. That party pledged itself to the country, and got all the votes it could by that pledge, that it would restore silver money. The Republican party went before the people and boasted of their great achievement in passing the Sherman law. None of the Republican national platforms he ever clamored for its repeal. Instead of asking for its repeal they said that they intended to restore silver as the standard money of this country. What has become of their pledges? Did they bring them to Washington with them when they assumed power, or did they discard them as impedimenta, not to be carried into real war?

Both parties of this country, Mr. President, Republican and Democratic alike, meet here in the face of the American people under the solemn pledges they gave to their masters, the sover-eign people of the United States, that they would restore the standard money of the people to this country.

I think I understand the design of those who cooperate with the Senator from Maine. Mid-summer had come, and the great grain crops of the country were about to move to Europe, and the cotton crop of the South was soon about to move to Europe. In the very nature of things, according to our economic his-tory and according to the easy foreshadowing of the near future. when ships had already been engaged for months ahead to carry them, it was known that the flow of gold from Europe to Amer-ica was about to occur, and it was clamored for, that the Sher-man bill should be instantly repealed in order that when gold came it could be pointed at as an object lesson, so that they could say: "Lo, and behold! The repeal of the Sherman act has brought the gold back." But the gold came, and the sources from which it came are well known, with the Sherman law unrepealed. At best it was sought for at the beginning as only an expedient for the nonce, to give us temporary relief. Then it was said, "We will go to work just as soon as it passes, and will comply with the rest of our promises to restore silver as standard money." Gold returned in large measure without the restal of the Sharman laws.

peal of the Sherman law.

The financial conditions of our country have been infinitely better recently without the repeal of the Sherman law. Out of $40,000,000 of bank issues, called clearing house certificates, so the markets become new that two-thirds of much better have the markets become now, that two-thirds of that quantity in New York has been retired as no longer needed as a makeshift for money. Business has begun to pick up by rea-son of the natural influences which are going on in purchases and sales and in the quantity of transcations.

Would it not have been better if these two months had been occupied in fixing up the measure that you promised to fix up?
Would it not be better to fix it up now, instead of speaking of destroying the Senate, breaking down the venerable and honordestroying the Senate, breaking down the venerable and honorable traditions of this great fortress of free debate, spending night after night in getting your reductant troops into the Senate Chamber, weary and heavy laden with the burdens of the day, and even then being left to call upon your opponents to preserve the continuity of the Senate by sitting up with you? Would it not have been better to have spent all this time in an analysis of the senate by sitting up with you? effort to discharge your promises? How long would it take the distinguished parliamentary lawyers and publicists here to frame a bill for that purpose? Two months? You have had that.

Ah, you are content, not with the unconditional repeal of this measure, but to give us a conditional repeal, in which you promise faithfully that you will continue to coin gold and silver; and presently, "in the sweet by and by" you will have the measure presently, in the sweet by and by you will have the measure all fixed up. But that is a condition-subsequent, and there is no collateral security for its performance. Why not turn it into a condition-precedent, instead of wearing your lives away sitting up of nights and bringing your reluctant fellows here at belated Why not spend your time in fixing into practical shape what you mean by your promises?

If there is distrust in some quarters as to the finances of this country, there is also distrust in other quarters as to what will be done with them. All that those with whom we train, and with whom we sympathize, ask of you is that you will keep your plighted faith to the people of this country, who gave you votes upon your promise that you would restore the standard money of this country. The performance of a contract is the shortest and easiest method of getting rid of the burden of the contract.

But, Mr. President, I have been led by these questions and by the diversion of those who have interjected their remarks into mine into a much more lengthy discourse than I had in-

In conclusion, I will briefly sum up my own position in this wise: I am here to legislate, and want to proceed to legislate in wise: I am here to legislate, and want to proceed to legislate in an orderly and straightforward manner. I do not want Senators to lecture me about breaking up the Democratic party as long as those Senators stand in the minority of that party and are unwilling to abide its judgment here. Furthermore, do not insist that your opponents shall have to come here at unusual hours and stay night and day, when those whom you claim to be to the majority do not the majority and stay in the majority do not the majority and the majority an in the majority do not themselves stay. Let us proceed sedately and regularly, considering one amendment, and then another, according to the rules and traditions of this honorable body, and we shall be much nearer the end than if we proceed by revolutionary methods to change the rules, and have to listen to revolutionary utterances of the majority, in regard to usurping the Government of this country, which are interjected into the

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas yields to me a moment in order that I may explain why the roll was called upon my demand.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has been delivering quite numerous and extensive lectures to some of us on account of absenteeism. He fired off his gun awhile ago at the Senator from Virginia, and then "took to the woods." I wanted to see if I could not get him back, and I am very glad to say that I have succeeded in doing so.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, in the discussion of the question now before the Senate I shall endeavor to do as I always have done-treat everyone with courtesy. I always perceive a distinction between a bad measure and a good man who advocates it. I may denounce the measure, whilst I may have the profoundest respect for the man who entertains and supports it.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has called me to account for a speech I made yesterday evening in this Chamber. I took the position then, which I have held for years, that the power conferred by the Constitution of the United States upon these two bodies is a permanent and continuing power, as full to-day as it was in 1789, when the Constitution granted it. This is no new doctrine with me.

The distinguished Senator apprehends that I spoke without eliberation. Mr. President, I uttered these sentiments in the deliberation. other House fifteen or sixteen years ago, when I believe I stood alone of my party, and I am not in a majority with it to-day on this floor. I concurred in the opinion delivered by Mr. Speaker Blaine, to which I referred yesterday evening, and which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has read to-day, that there is a permanent power in both of these Houses to make the rules necessary to enable them to dispatch the public business, and to execute the trust which the people of the United States have confided to the legislative department of this Government

Will the Senator allow me to ask him a brief Mr. DANIEL.

question'

Mr. MILLS. My friend wants to ask me a question when I did not ask him one.

Mr. DANIEL. If it will interrupt the Senator I shall desist.
I only desired to ask him if it was the decision of Speaker Blaine that he referred to?

Mr. MILLS. It was the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine in the short session of the Forty-third Congress after the rules had been adopted and after the rules had prescribed the manner in which they should be amended, and the decision was made against his own party. Nearly two-thirds of that body were Re-publicans at that time, and they were beseeching Mr. Blaine day after day and night after night to take a near cut, as parliamentarians do sometimes.

He said he would stay there and enforce the rules, which he did, as they were made by his party. He said to them, "If you want to amend the rules, if you want to make or unmake them, I will not entertain any dilatory motions, because a parliament ary body has the right at all times to make the rules necessary to carry into effect the will of the majority of the body.

It is gravely contended by great lawyers on this floor that this sovereign body can abdicate the powers confided to it by the Con-sovereign body can abdicate the powers confided to it by the constitution in trust; that having executed the power at one time, it is done, and the body is stricken with paralysis.

My friend charges me with being guilty of revolution. I thank him for "teaching me that word." Who is guilty of revolution in this body when it has been sitting here for more than two months utterly imbecile; while indignation is sweeping over the whole land, and a great people, a people who have touched the highest point of civilization upon the face of the globe, sees this body, once the pride of the Republic, utterly imbecile, utterly unable to transact any business? As Mr. Jefferson once said about Congress—and I am reproved by my friend for quoting him—in his day, when the Congress was talking too much, they were "stricken with the rage of debate;" and we are now reproved, and rebuked, and denounced as revolutionists because, forsooth, we do not come here and make a brutal test of physical strength by sitting up all night with some Senator standing on the floor and reading papers for fifteen hours, and one other Senator standing in his place to demand a roll call every five minutes, when some of us who would like to sleep a little in order to recuperate our physical strength are tortured by being compelled to come here and stand up and take the punishment.

Two persons in this body, one to speak and the other to demand a roll call every five minutes, can compel the whole body to stay here until human nature is exhausted, and when we apal to the Constitution, the great sheet anchor of the liberties of the people, that business may be done in an orderly manner, we are denounced as revolutionists. We are impotent, and yet We are impotent, and yet a majority of the Senators of the United States are here ready to vote on any constitutional measure. I shall never join in censuring a minority for using the rules to obstruct a majority who, as Mr. Jefferson says, in the "wantonness of power," may have broken the barriers of the Constitution, and when they do so I shall, with all the parliamentary power that has been given me by the rules, resist.

I did it in the Forty-third Congress. I declared the act which they were attempting to pass and which they did pass an unconstitutional one, and so did the party to which I belong, and the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decision which the Democrats made on that floor when the bill was passed and attempted to be executed, that it was unconstitutional and void

Mr. President, I did not blame minorities, I do not blame minorities for exercising all the rights given to them by the They have the right to the rules as well as the majority, and if I believed as my friends do sitting across that aisle, that the law which the majority is seeking to enact was one hurtful to my constituents and you gave me the rules to defeat its passage by speeches and debate until I could invoke the public judgment of the country and the public verdict upon the question, I would avail myself of it. I am not blaming minorities; I am blaming majorities for sitting still upon this floor like children and permitting minorities to dictate and to paralyze the Government.

Our Government is to-day in paralysis. We can no appropriation bill; we can not pass a bill to reduce We can not pass an we can not emancipate our commerce; we can not give the poor people employment who are wandering the streets out of work and without bread, because we are told that the Senate, once having made rules, has abdicated its power; and this great branch of the Government, instituted and empowered to legislate for the people of the United States within the grants of the Constitution, is a dead body until the minority permit it to act; it is incapable of doing anything unless it does what the minority says shall be done

Yes, Mr. President, the issue has entirely changed. It is useless to discuss before this body or the country the wisdom or unwisdom of repealing the Sherman act. The great question in which the American people have the deepest interest to-day is, Shall the majority rule in the legislative branch of the Government; shall the public will be enacted in the legislative branch of the Government, or are we to stand at the demand of a minority on the floor and let them say, "You must agree to the terms that we prescribe: you may register our decrees?" that we prescribe; you may register our decrees?"

I am asked tauntingly, will I go into a caucus and will I sign a paper that I will agree to abide by and carry into execution whatever the majority of that caucus shall write down. I say without any hesitation, no. I have not touched that point of self-abasement that I will come here and register the will of somebody from some other part of the land. Never, sir, as long as I have been connected with the other House or this body has it been demanded of any caucus of the party to which I have belonged that they should carry out the wishes and the views and the will of the minority in reference to legislation. A caucus is held to nominate candidates and those composing it abide by the result. A conference means that you will go into conference where you have differences, and if you can reconcile them well and good.

Mr. BUTLER. Will you do that? Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; I said to my friend yesterday I would, and I will do it.

Mr. President, returning to the argument that the Senate is without power, the question is asked whether the rules are binding until they are amended. Certainly they are, just as a law is binding until it is repealed. Certainly it is binding; but have not the people who made a law the right to repeal the law in accordance with the terms of the Constitution? Is the legislative department of the Government paralyzed after having once made a law, as if the two prescribes that it can only be repealed or amended by the unanimous vote of the members of the Legisla-ture? Is it like the laws of the Medes and Persians to stand for-ever, notwithstanding the public will may have changed and notwithstanding it may have been demonstrated that it was vicious and hurtful in the extreme?

My friend from Virginia is a lawyer, and a great lawyer and an author, but I am afraid he has not studied this question. I am afraid he has not studied it to the bottom. Where does absolute sovereignty reside in this country? We were told to-day in this body, and told truly, that it resides in England in the British Parliament; but in this country it resides in the people. The people make a Constitution and in that Constitution they say how it shall be amended. In the very Constitution that brings us together here as Senators the manner is prescribed in which it shall be amended. But suppose they who builded the Constitution and made that declaration should meet in their primary capacities all over the country and send delegates to a national convention and make a new one, and ratify it by the power of the whole people of the country, will anybody say that is an illegal instrument? It is not just the way they pointed out, but it is still their constitution; it proceeds from the paramount power that creates a constitution, and therefore it is legal and binding.

Suppose the rules made by this body or by the other had said they should be amended by only unanimous consent, that means that you never shall amend them, and one person standing alone throws himself across the whole pathway of legislation, stops if entirely, and paralyzes the Government, just as it is paralyzed to-day. Here it is confessed that under the existing rules of this body it is impossible to legislate. It is confessed that a minority can prevent legislation, and we all know that it can prevent any legislation, I do not care what it is.

Here we are before the country a pitiable spectacle, the Senate of the United States, the arena where Webster once spoke and Clay thundered with that eloquence which shook a continent Clay thundered with this stody and butler and Douglas, and the great men who have gone before us; and this body for the first time in the century of its existence, a body that Henry Clay said was the noblest gun that ever thundered in defense of the Constitution, is paralyzed and dead. You can not even galvanize it into life with a galvanic battery unless you go back and touch the paramount power confided to this body by the Constitution and make a rule by which the majority can transact the business devolving upon it.

I am now in favor of making that rule. It is no new doctring with me. As I said a while ago, fifteen or eighteen years ago, when this question was up in the House of Representatives, in a colloquy between Gen. Garfield, then a member of the House, and myself, he took the position my friend is now taking and I took the other position, and announced just exactly what I have stated the other position, and announced just exactly what I have stated here to-day. Afterwards, by party exigencies, he swapped his side and took my side. Mr. Carlisle read to the House the utterance of Gen. Garfield in reply to me when I contended then, as I am contending now (and I presume alone, for I do not know that any other Democrat did), that the power to make rules was in the body every moment of its existence, and that the body may, at any moment, repeal and disregard all its code of rules and make another code if it wants to do so.

After Mr. Blaine's decision had been made it was quoted by Mr. Keifer in making a rule in the same way in defiance of the rules of the House, by an appeal direct to the paramount power of the body, he quoted Mr. Blaine's words that my friend read a while ago, and he entertained the motion to make a rule to do business, and refused to entertain a dilatory motion, and made The large body of the Democratic members protested against his ruling on that ground. They brought the paper to me to sign and I refused to sign it. You will find thirty, forty, or fifty names on that paper, but you will not find mine. It is no new idea with me

The Constitution of the United States is supreme; and this body under the Constitution is supreme over the question of its rules every moment of its existence. It can not escape the con-States will hold it to account. They have not lost their sovereignty, and they will fail to appreciate the argument when it is made to them that because the Senate of the United States, a continuing body, having made a rule by which it has put it out of its power to do business, this Senate never can change it; it may live fifty years, one hundred years, five hundred years, it may live until it takes its place beside the grand Roman Senate in history, and to the last moment of its recorded existence it can not make a rule for the reason that it can not make it in the way which has been prescribed to amend its rules, because a minority will not let it do so.

The argument is that the Government is dead. The argument is that this country ceases to have legislative power. The argument is that there is no abuse that can any more be cured by legislation in this country. The argument is that majorities cease to rule and henceforth in this country there must be an oligarchy or a minority rule in the Government.

No. 1 do not call the gentlemen of the minority to account. The rules permit you to do this. You can go on and do it. The country is not going to call you to account o much, but the country will call to account the majority on this floor on both sides if they do not come together and make a rule by which the decrees of the American people shall be registered as their representatives here demand that it shall be done.

I am not going to be frightened by being called a revolutionist. Mr. President, suppose I was to agree to go into a caucus with my colleagues, and when I got in there I found a manual with my colleagues. jority of them declaring for a protective tariff. Do you suppose I am to abandon all the convictions of a lifetime and come in here and help to carry out the doctrine of a protective tarif! Suppose, contrary to the teachings of Jefferson and the great fathers, a majority of the party should declare in favor of national banks, am I to come into this body and lay down all the convictions of my lifetime and carry out the convictions of other people, misrepresent my own people, abandon my own convic tions and my own manhood, and get down on my stomach and lick the boots of somebody who holds opposing views?

I never abandoned my convictions to any party caucus; they have always been preserved. When we were on the tariff we had a large element in our party differing from the majority of its members. Iremember that Mr. Randall specifically declared its members. I remember that Mr. Randall specifically declared he would not be bound at the start when we went into the caucus about any legislation whatever; that it was anti-Democratic and against the creed and practices of our party; and that has been accepted as the rule with us at all times. No; I will not go into any caucus and agree to submit my convictions to any body's alternatic but I will confer with anybody in this Chember 1. into any caucus and agree to submit my convictions to any body's judgment; but I will confer with anybody in this Chamber, and especially with our household of faith, if they do not get to be especially with our nousehold of latter, it they do not get to be too unfaithful, and see if we can not agree on something by which this great nightmare may be dispelled from the country.

I was rebuked this morning by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morsan] because I had the effrontery to stand in my place and say that I was the proprietor of my own vote and would not vote for any amendment to the pending bill. I suppose I am not vote for any amendment to the pending only. Esuppose I am not to be permitted to enjoy that distinction in this body unless I ask the consent of the Senator from Alabama. I am the proprietor and owner of myown vote, and I shall vote it as I please. There was a time when I would have listened to compromises; there was a time when I wanted to compromise; there was a time when I wanted to compromise; there was a time when I wanted to compromise; when I talked compromise on this question; but, Mr. President, when Congress first convened and the guns were opened on a Democratic Administration and the chief of that Administra-Democratic Administration and the enter of that Administra-tion was charged with infidelity to his party, his Secretary of the Treasury arraigned, his Comptroller of the Currency ar-raigned, and the beginning of an anti-Administration party started on this floor, I cut down my bridges and burned my boats behind me on the subject of a compromise.

I am a Democrat and stand by the organized administration of my arty, and the Democratic people all over the United States are going to do the same thing. A great many people have told what the people of the country are going to do, and there have been various prophecies. They do not intend to abandon that organization, nor do they intend to see the chief of that Administration shot down. They will stand by him when the buttle is en, and they will carry him through in triumph, too.

I do not intend to be deterred by taunts that I am serving with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]; that he is my chief. Politics makes strange bedfellows, Mr. President, and the present condition of the country throws me and a number of my brethren on this side in company with the distinguished Sena-ter from Ohio. But where does it throw the other gentlemen? Inder the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

Mr. President, it is a question of taste very much about these ings. There is an unwritten law—no, it is written—de quetibus non est disputundum. Let everyone go wherever it suits him. The Senator from Ohio and those who are acting with him on his side of the Chamber are standing for the old Democratic doctrine of sound currency, gold, silver, and paper at par all over the country. I give him my hand in this contest. from Kansas is contending for overturning the whole system of finance, issuing paper money, and lifting the business of the country in the air on paper money, bidding adieu to the basis of gold and silver. He is for Government ownership of railroads, and telegraphs, and perhaps every other thing that it can find lying loose around about in the country.

If there is more affinity, if there is more of attackment and kinship for the doctrine of the Senator from Kansas, I say to my friends, go as you like. I shall stand with those who stand for a scund and stable currency, and nothing short of that. I will not knowingly vote for anything that banishes either of the metals out of the circulation of this country. I will not vote for any measure that banishes both metals out of circulation in this country and puts its finances on a paper standard.

My friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller], a very generous, brave, and noble adversary, struck a little below the belt this morning when he referred to my speech in the State of Ohio and in the town where the distinguished Senator from Ohio resides, the only speech that I made in that State in which I discussed the question of silver or currency. All my other speeches there were upon the tariff. That is my only speech in Ohio that was printed, and of course it is the speech to which my friend. refers. He can not find a line in that speech nor a word in it that approves the Sherman act. I challenge my friend to pro-He will find a statement in it when I was discussing the benefits which the people were to receive from the free coinage of silver. I said that after all other demands had been satisfied there could not exceeding $60,000,000 of silver of free coinage come to our mints; that under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1800, we were getting from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 in Treasury notes, and that if the act were repealed and free coinage substituted there could not be a difference of more than $8,000,000 or $10,000,000. Isimply discussed the existing condition. I did not approve it, for it is well known all over the whole country that every Democrat in both Houses of Congress voted against the act: and I was in the other House when it was passed. It is unnecessary for me to reiterate what I have said heretofore about silver

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment? Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I certainly did not mean to misrepresent the Senator.

No, indeed.

Mr. TELLER. I had not looked at his speech. I did not know the exact language he used.

Mr. MILLS. I am perfectly satisfied of that.
Mr. TELLER. My impression was no said in substance "you have not free coinage, but you have practically the same thing. That is all I meant to say. I accept the Senator's explanation.

Mr. MILLS. That is correct. I did not want this matter to go out unanswered. I have taken the position that I am in favor of free coinage, as I said the other day, and unlimited coinage, provided, as laid down in the platform of the party, it meant bimetallism. At one time I did believe that it did mean bimetallism. I have so stated it, but I have reached the conclusion in my own brain (and I am not trying to impose my convictions on anybody else) that the time has come when that can not be done, and if it can not be done, then if you open your mints to the free coinage of silver you will take more of the silver of the world than you will get by limited coinage, and you would take so of the silver of the world as to disturb its distribution all over the face of the earth, and in a short time this would become a silver-standard country and out of harmony with the commer-

Then I showed the evil effects of that, which I do not intend to repeat. I asked the question the other day, and I am going to repeat it to-day, if all the mints of the world are thrown open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, how much silver would be added to the silver circulation of the world? The dis-guished Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones], the best posted man on that question perhaps in the United States, said in his speech a few days ago that there were not 25,000,000 ounces of silver in the entire world.

Mr. KYLE. Available silver.

MILLS. What does the Senator mean by available sil-I am speaking of available silver. He meant, of course, Mr. MILLS. breastpins and trinkets and earrings and cane heads, and all that was unavailable.
Mr. KYLE. Unavailable silver, charms, idols, etc.

Mr. MILLS. Precisely. I have a walking stick; I do not know whether it is in the cloakroom or not. If I had it here I would show you the head of that stick, which cost three or four dollars, and I venture to say that there is not 50 cents worth of silver in it. Do you suppose when you open the mints to the free coinage of silver that I am going to saw off the head of that walking cane, that cost three or four dollars, and have it coined for 50 cents? The world is full of the manufactures of silver.

As I told you the other day, in four hundred years $9,000,000,000 of silver have been produced, and only $4,000,000,000 of it are in the coinage of the world to-day. Five thousand million dollars of it have gone into manufactures; and for three hundred years of that time every mint in Christendom has been open to its reception for free coinage. Why is it that all the immense amount of silver in India did not go into the mints when they had free coinage, and at a ratio of 15 to 1? The land is full of idols and ornaments, every conceivable kind of thing that will adapt itself to the wants and tastes of the people; and yet, in the whole history of that people, with their mints open and coinage at a higher ratio than ours, it has never been able to get any part of that silver coined. Where is it to come from? It is not to be found on the globe.

Then what are you going to gain by the free coinage of silver? If our friends are right over yonder, you may bring the silver dollar of 3711 grains, now worth 57 cents, up to 100 cents; and you give them 43 cents. I can understand that; but I silver dollar of 371t grains, now worth 57 cents, up to 100 cents, and you give them 43 cents. I can understand that; but I am not representing the mine owners; I am representing the men who mine sweat. You make your arguments in favor of the people, the whole people, the wage laborer, and the hired day laborer who are always swindled by anything except the very best dollar that may be given to them. I showed that, too, the other day, and I am not going to do it again.

I want to know how the people of the United States are to be

I want to know how the people of the United States are to be benefited unless you can increase the circulation of the world? If you do, the money gets cheaper as you increase the body of the circulation. Now, that is an established and admitted fact. I see my friend from Colorado bows to it. It is stated by political economists, it is stated by Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay, and all the greatmen we have had. That is the case, because it complies with the law of demand and supply. Double the quantity of cotton, with the demand remaining the same, and the price will fall one-half. Double the quantity of silver and gold, and if the demand for it will remain the same its price will fall to one-half, and everything else will go up double. That is an established fact.

Now, the people of the United States have believed that there is some vast amount of silver in the world that is going to come into our mints and raise prices; and they never think that it is going to raise the price of what they have got to buy as well as the price of what they have got to sell. They think of raising the price of what they have got to sell. They think of raising the price of what they have got to sell, and that is the only way they can be benefited. The debtors will be benefited, but the men who bought and sold to-day would buy by the higher prices and sell by the higher prices, and their property would be precisely on the same basis.

Then what benefit is all this? Unless it adds materially to the circulation of the world it means nothing, absolutely nothing. Why not then stand up before our people and look them in the face and tell them just exactly what this means; tell them that the mine-owner who has the bullion to sell is benefited? Of course he is. We have $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 of silver. I want to know how it has benefited things in Texas and around about generally.

In 1878, before there was a dollar of it coined except what was coined to redeem the fractional paper currency in circulation, we heard the rumblings of this complaint all over the country; and since that time we have got about $1,200,000,000 of gold and silver in the country and we hear precisely the same complaint. The money is not in circulation; that is what is the matter. It is in the country, but it is not incirculation. It might have been put in circulation if the Democratic party had had control of this Government in both branches in 1890 and a Democratic President, if our friends who are now clamoring for free coinage and stopping the wheels of legislation on this floor had aided us the passage of a bill to emancipate our commerce and permit our products to go to foreign lands to be sold, to increase the demand and thus increase the prices, on the same principle that free coinage will increase the demand for silver and increase its price.

Free coinage will furnish another demand for silver, but it will take a free market to furnish another demand for cotton, corn, wheat, oats, and the things our farmers are selling. That is the only way we can make an addition to our circulation in its distribution, and that is the only way that we can relieve the distresses of the country so far as they are real.

Mr. President, I return for a moment to the point where I began. I say again that I do not reproach the minority, and I am not lecturing anybody because I speak freely. I speak my sentiments, I speak them courteously, but I speak them earnestly, because I feel earnestly. I have the highest respect for every member in this body and the strongest personal attachment for many from whom I differ.

But, Mr. President, I do not blame the minority for what they have done. The rule permits it. Mr. Jefferson in, laying down the Manual made by him when he was Vice-President as you are, and when he had to preside over this body as you are presiding over it, and when he had to have some rules, went back, contrary to the ideas of the Senator from Alabama, who thought that nothing could be learned from the English Parliament and that our rules of procedure had no analogy whatever to the rules of procedure of the English Parliament; and that great legislator and statesman and sage says that he obtained the body of his rules from the English Parliament.

But to what system of rules is he to recur as supplementary to those of the Senate?

He, the Presiding Officer himself-

To this there can be but one answer. To the system of regulat, and adopted for the government of some one of the parliamentary bodies within these States, or of that which has served as a prototype to most of them. This last is the model which we have all studied, while we are little acquainted with the modifications of it in our several States. It is deposited, too, in publications possessed by many and open to all. Its rules are probably as wisely constructed for governing the debates of a deliberative body, and obtaining its true sense, as any which can become known to us; and the acquiescence of the Senate, hitherto, under the references to them has given them the sanction of their approbation.

He starts out by quoting a declaration of one of the most distinguished of the Speakers of the House of Commons:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say, "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority, against the attempts of power."

What does Mr. Jefferson say?

So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense, that an it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power, are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House.

He says that the rules are intended to protect minorities, and I have contended that over and over again. A minority havea right to take their position within the rules. I close where I started. The responsibility is placed on the majority of the members of this body to make rules and legislate, and if they do not do it an intelligent and an indignant public opinion will hold that majority to account.

that majority to account.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the question before the Senate nor to discuss the general question of the necessity for an amendment of the rules. If I were to undertake it, I could add nothing to the very able speech which has just been delivered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Mills]. But I do not propose to remain silent when my conduct in this body is criticised or my motives are questioned.

Yesterday when I made a motion to correct the minutes I stated in a very few sentences why I believed the motion was in order and my reasons for offering it. I believed and I still believe it was within the power and that it was the duty of the Senate to order the minutes corrected in accordance with my motion. A large majority in the Senate, either supposing that the motion was not in order, disagreeing with me in that respect, or desiring to cut off discussion, or acting upon the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] that he was not here at the time his name was called (which however did not alter the case, as he was confessedly here before the roll call was ended), laid my motion on the table.

I also subsequently in a very few words stated that I believe it to be the duty of the majority to have an amendment to the rules reported to the Senate, and after it has been discussed for a resonable time it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to refuse to recognize Senators and put it to a vote, and if it is adopted by a majority to have it enforced. I shall not discuss those propositions. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Daniel] said that I had delivered in the Senate three speeches upon the silver question. That is true; but the time occupied in the delivery of all three I do not think would equal the time occupied by the Senator from Virginia in delivering his single speech. Certainly if it had not been for continuous interruptions by Senators the time of the delivery of all three would not nearly have equaled the time consumed by him.

But I wish now to say that however I may differ from my associates in this Chamber who are in favor of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, I made up my mind long since that I would not, as I have done on some former occasions, sit silent in the Senate and allow those in the minority to discuss a question from day to day and have their speeches go out to the country when I believe that something should be said to go to the country also and to my constituents; and if some Senator with more ability and more experience than myself did not do it I would do it for myself. It is quite possible that before this discussion is ended I shall feel it incumbent on me to call the attention of the Senate to some other propositions connected with this measure, and I shall not ask the consent of the Senator from Virginia to do it, or the consent of a minority of the body.

The motion I made yesterday was not made for delay. It was in order; it was pertinent; it was legitimate; and certainly it was timely, considering the fact that the night before we had spent hours here rotating between a call of the Senate and a vote which disclosed the want of a quorum on the motion of the chairman of the Finance Committee to suspend the order to the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring Senators into the Chamber. Considering the fact that such scenes have been enacted time after time in this bedra Leav navestion was timely, and it was pertinent.

at Arms to bring Senators into the Chamber. Considering the fact that such scenes have been enacted time after time in this body, I say my motion was timely, and it was pertinent.

Mr. President, it was not only that, but it has not been wholly fruitless. It has caused a discussion in the Senate during the last two days which for instruction and ability has so far surpassed anything that has transpired in the Senate in the last six weeks as to be beyond comparison. Nor has it delayed the vote upon the pending measure. Senators who have discussed this question have gone into the merits of the silver question; they have discussed the pending measure, and they have delivered speeches which it is evident they would have delivered sooner or later in the discussion.

So far from delaying the final vote upon the pending measure, in my judgment it has brought to the attention of the country the fact that the Senate is now drifting helplessly down the stream of talk without a rudder and without ability to bring the measure to a vote, and it has called the attention of the country and of the political majority in this body to the duty of the majority here to agree upon the measure or to formulate a measure and bring it before the Senate. In my judgment it has hastened the time when we may vote upon the pending question.

Mr. President, I do not agree with some Senators who stand with me for the passage of the measure before the Senate that every moment that is occupied with something else postpones the day when a vote can be had. I have not thought from the beginning that under our rules and the construction placed upon them it is possible to get a vote. The Senator, whose speech has been interrupted by these proceeding, has books upon his desk now, which, if he should read to the Senate, would take until New Year's Day; and if he should undertake to read them through—as it has been announced by the Presiding Officer within two or three days past that there is no rule by which the readin two or three days past that there is no rule by which the reading of them could be declared not germane to the question at issue—after those volumes were exhausted he could send a page to the Congressional Library and bring books here the reading of which would occupy a period which would be greater than the aggregate life of every Senator in this body.

Mr. President, it is utterly idle, it is farcical, in my judgment, to suppose that we can reach a vote on this question simply by long continuous sessions of the Senate, either during the night or during the hours of the day.

I resent the imputation that I have offered a dilatory motion or that I have sought to postpone the day when we can vote upon the pending measure. I simply do not agree with the Senators who suppose that by holding night sessions and holding the Senate in session at unusual hours we are going to bring about a vote any earlier.

As I said, I do not desire to discuss the question before the Senate. I simply desired to refute the imputation which was made by the Senator from Virginia that I have offered a dilatory motion or that I had unnecessarily consumed the time of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me correct the Senator there. I did not say the Senator had offered a dilatory motion, but a motion which in itseffect was obliged to be dilatory. The motion is not the control of the senator had been approximately account. one prescribed in parliamentary language, but the question which the Senator presented is one of the most serious possible, relating to the dignity of the Senate and to the question of the amendment of the rules.

I beg leave to say, while I am upon my feet, for I do not wish to protract the debate, that as high authority as Mr. Blaine is now before me, and which I could quote, to the effect that such a proposal to amend is entirely ineffective. It would have led a proposal to amend is entirely ineffective. It would have led to a debate as long as the silver question itself.

What I wish to call attention to is the fact that the gentlemen who are repealers make frequent and long speeches with great pleasure, but only manifest their impatience when others speak, and furthermore, while they insist that the Senate can do nothing, they themselves—not the Senator from Oregon—bring about that condition by requiring their opponents to stay here to make a quorum and by imagining that they can better serve their country in bringing about a vote by staying in bed.

Mr. DOLPH. On the motion made by me debate could have been cut off at any moment by a motion to lay on the table. So it was in the power of the Senate at any time to bring that before the Senate. Besides that, four-fifths of the Senator's speech was upon the pending bill, the silver question, and that has been the case with the great majority of speeches that have been spoken here on the motion to amend the Journal. We have been discussing the pending bill more than the question upon the motion before the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. So with the speeches of the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas. All of the repealers seem to be fond of talking about that bill, no matter what may be the subject under discussion, and they are never impatient except when some one on the other side ventures to speak.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is wrong as to the character of my speech. I simply presented my views upon the question in a

CORRECTION OF BILL.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in the bill (H. R. 2344) for the better control and to protect the safety of the national banks, that was passed yesterday, there is a misprint, and the wrong word is used. In line 14, page 3, of the bill, this language is used: "Which are part due and remain unpaid." It should be "past due" and unpaid. I ask unanimous consent that this correction may be made.

The SPEAKER.. Without objection, this correction will be made, so that the bill may be properly enrolled.

There was no objection and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings in the case of R. P. Chambers, deceased, against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and or-

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of cases under act of March 3, 1883, dismissed for want of further jurisdiction on the preliminary inquiry of loyalty; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DIVISION OF EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3713) to provide for the division of the eastern district of Michigan into the northern and southern divisions, and for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States therein, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF NORTH CAPITOL STREET.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. CLERKS AND MARSHALS' FEES, ETC.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3963) to amend sections 828, 833, 847, and 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to clerks' fees, semiannual return of fees by district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, commissioners' fees, and to offenders against the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a consolidation of House bills 341, 342, 343, and 344. These bills are the same as House bills 9610, 9611, 9612, and 9613, in the Fifty-second Congress. They were reported to the House in that Congress by the Judiciary Committee under a resolution passed February I, 1892, requiring the committee to investigate into certain alleged abuses of judicial process and irregularities in the conduct of court of floors. court officers. The resolution authorized the committee to report by bill or otherwise.

The four bills amending sections 828, 833, 847, and 1014 of the Revised Statutes, were reported by the committee and passed the Fifty-second Congress without objection. but failed, for want of time, in the Senate. Section 828 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relates to the fees of clerks of the circuit and district courts.

There is no provision in this section as it now stands for naturalization fees. The result is, clerks of the United States circuit and district courts, in many places, notably so in Massachusetts, have refused to return as part of the emoluments of their offices fees received for the naturalization of aliens.

In Boston as many as 4,000 aliens have been naturalized in one year (the year 1888) and in succeeding years between Presidential elections in no year was there less than 1,000. For the years 1888 to 1891, inclusive, there were 8,280 aliens naturalized in the circuit court of Massachusetts. None of the fees charged by the clerks were returned as emoluments. This refusal was put upon the ground that no fees for naturalization had been fixed by any act of Congress, and therefore clerks had the right to retain them.

The first section of this bill amends section 828 by adding fixed fees for naturalizing aliens, a fee for first and final papers. This amendment was recommended by the Attorney-General and the officers of the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

The second section of this bill proposes to amend section 833

of the Revised Statutes, which relates to the emolument returns of the clerks of the United States courts. The only amendment proposed requires these officers to include specifically in their returns fees received for naturalization of aliens fixed by the first section of the bill.

This section of the Revised Statutes, as it now stands, would appear to be sufficient to cover all fees of every kind received by the officer by virtue of his appointment. It requires the clerk the officer by virtue of his appointment. It requires the eierk to make semiannually "a written return for the half year ending on said days, respectively, of all fees and emoluments of his office of every name and character." This language would seem to be comprehensive enough to cover fees charged and received for the naturalization of aliens, yet they are not included or re-turned by many circuit or district court clerks, and the Government has lost a large amount of money by reason of this failure or refusal to include them.

The third section of this bill proposes to amend section 847 of the Revised Statutes. That section relates to clerks' fees. As it now stands, it allows "for hearing and deciding on criminal charges $5 a day for the time necessarily employed." The change proposed to be made in this section is to allow $5 per day for all services in any criminal case, and where no arrest has been made to limit the fees to $2. Instead of the above provisions in the section as it now stands, allowing of numerous continu-ances and charges for each day's hearing, the following changes are proposed to be made in relation to these hearings in crimi-

For issning a warrant, docketing the same, and all proceedings on a criminal charge where no arrest is made, $2.

For hearing and deciding on criminal charges, including docketing of same, recognizances of defendant, sureties of witnesses, return to court, and all proceedings thereon, $5 and no more.

One of the abuses complained of by the First Comptroller and the Attorney-General was that in many parts of the country com-missioners, for the purpose of making fees against the Government, were in the habit of holding preliminary hearings and by some arrangement, or for some reason, adjourning these hearings from day to day, requiring the attendance of the witnesses and parties, and charging up to the Government fees under the old fee bill at $5 a day for the commissioner and mileage and witness fees for the witnesses, making large fees against the Government unnecessarily.

The resolution calling upon the Judiciary Committee to make this examination and report required the committee to investi-gate all complaints of the abuses of judicial power or authority by any officers of the judicial department of the United States, to which attention might be specially called by the Attorney-General of the United States or the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, or which might come to their knowledge from other reliable sources. The Attorney-General especially directed the committee's attention to the abuses complained under this section in and connected with the circuit and district courts of Mussachusetts at Boston.

A great deal of testimony was taken and the committee found that a great many cases were continually being instituted before a United States commissioner at Boston where the party was simply arrested and discharged, and many cases where no arrest at all was made, and yet the commissioner's fees under this section were figured up and returned against the Government and allowed in each case $4.15 for the commissioner. The difficulty between the accounting department of the Treasury and the commissioners is as to the construction of the act, the commissioner claiming that construction always which gives him the largest amount of fees.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the object to be accomplished by this bill, in four sections, is a reduction of the fees of olerks of circuit and district courts of the United States and the commissioners of those courts, and to secure a faithful return of the emoluments of their offices, including fees which they now receive and refuse to report as a part of the emoluments of their

The first section of the bill fixes what the section, 833 did not fix, the fees for naturalization of aliens. The second section provides for the return of those fees as a part of the emoluments of the offices. The third section of the bill proposes to amend sec the offices. The third section of the bill proposes to amend section 847 of the Revised Statutes, which regulates the fees of commissioners of United States courts. Section 833 was passed in was perhaps sufficient; but commissioners of United States courts have learned a great deal in the way of fee-making during the last few years, and to-day there is no officer in the United States who can abuse his office so much as the commissioner of the United States court.

This is especially the case when he is at the same time super-This is especially the case when he is at the same time supervisor of elections. I would be one who would be pleased to vote for the abolition of those officers and for dispensing with United States court commissioners entirely if it could possibly be done. Under the resolution requiring the Committee on the Judiciary to examine into and report upon certain alleged irregularities in connection with the administration of the laws of the United States courts, we were required to direct our attention specifically to such places in the United States as the Attorney-General might require of us. He requested the committee especially to examine into the courts and into the practice of the United States commissioners of Boston. The Subcommittee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-second Congress devoted its attention principally in Boston and to the commissioners for the State of Massachusetts. I do not pretend to say that the evils we found prevailing there did not prevail to as large extent at other places.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me? I desire to inquire if any fees are increased by this bill?

Mr. WOLVERTON. No fees are increased; but they are re-

Mr. WOLVERTON. No lees are increased, duced, I will say to the gentleman from Maine. It is very difficult to remedy the evil of fee-making against the Government by legislation. The remedy rests largely in the courts who control the appointment of commissioners and the power to control its appointees and officers by rules of court regulating the practice and proceedings before them.

An earnest cooperation of the judges and district attorney would in most cases be far more effectual than any legislation on the subject.

The approval of bills made out by the officers of the court of the United States circuit and district courts is now pro forma and under decisions of the courts this approval is prima facie evidence of the officer's right to recover his claim by suit against the Government.

The Comptroller's department and the Department of Justice cut down these bills which come to them with the proforma approval of the courts about one-half, as will be seen by the evidence. Suits are then brought to recover the disallowed items in the courts that formerly approved the accounts. The result is, judgments are recovered by the claimants against the Government for large amounts.

The courts having approved the accounts as a matter of form decline to change their former action. In this way the action of the Comptroller and the Attorney-General has little effect to ultimately prevent the fee-maker from recovering any bill he may choose to render. These suits are brought by the officers and appointees of the court, which gives the plaintiff an advantage in his litigation.

Legislation seems necessary to prevent this practice.

The testimony showed that for many years great abuses have prevailed in the administration of the office of United States commissioner in different parts of the country.

It shows that combinations can be made between professional It shows that combinations can be made between professional informers and officers serving process, by which large fees can be worked up against the Government and citizens subjected to great and unnecessary hardships, and in many cases made the victims of great abuses under the guise of so-called legal process. The testimony shows that there is no office that can be more abused than that of United States commissioner, and particularly when the commissioner is at the same time supervisor of election

It could not happen that a warrant of process of a marshal or deputy could be served by a postal card with the words "fail not," and the marshal receive his fees without collusion between the commissioner and marshal. In docketing the papers it would seem impossible that the commissioner should fail to notice the character of the service.

Mr. Hallett held the position of United States commissioner, that of supervisor of elections, and is also one of the masters in chancery, appointed by the court in many cases.

During the years 1884, 1886, 1888, and 1890 Mr. Hallett, as supervisor of elections, instituted 256 suits before Mr. Hallett, as United States commissioner, for violation of the registration laws. Of these, 79 were sent up, 74 discharged, and in 103 cases no arrests made.

In cases where no arrests were made his fees as commissioner were $4.15 in each case, and in the others the costs were much larger. These cases, according to Mr. Nightingale's testimony, cover those where he found in investigating the accounts of the marshal service of the process was made by postal cards and fees charged, as if an actual arrest had been made and the prisery brought before the magistrate.

The testimony of Mr. Hallett and his docket show that the office of supervisor of elections and of United States commissioner are incompatible offices and should not be held by the came person. It would not be deemed proper in any country or under any code of laws that the prosecuting officer and the judge should be one and the same person.

These combined offices were quite lucrative. In question, the commissioner stated to the committee: In answer to a

I carry on my household expenses, and act and feel as if I had an income of $4,000 or $5,000 per year.

The remedy suggested by every witness connected with the Comptroller's office and the Department of Just 1 for the correction of the difficulties attending the adjustment of bills rendered by United States commissioners is the thorough revision of the fee bill relating to this office.

These fees are now regulated by the act of the 26th of February, 1853, section 847 of the Revised Statutes. There is too much left to construction in the existing fee bill.

The fact that there could occur the wide difference between the Comptroller's Office and Mr. Hallett in relation to the bills rendered by him shows the necessity of this action by Congress.

Some limit should be fixed for the amount of fees in any case and for certain services in each case. For instance, for the drawing of the complaint, issuing of the warrant, and docketing the case, including all services, a certain amount. The hearing, taking bail for appearance at court, including swearing the witnesses, the necessary recognizances for parties, suitors, and witnesses, and entering the same on the docket, a certain sum, to include the return and all services.

Such a bill should be carefully prepared by the Department of Justice or the Comptroller's department. Their experience in making adjustments of accounts between these Departments and the commissioners would enable them to draw a fee bill which would be a definite and certain remedy for the evils complained

The Comptroller's department and Department of Justice were requested to prepare a bill covering all these abuses and placing such restrictions and limitations upon fee-making, so that the abuse would be less likely to occur.

We have especially tried to limit the fees of the United States commissioners in the amendment we propose to section 847 of the Revised Statutes. That section as it stands leaves a good deal open to the construction of the officers, and the United States commissioner invariably puts such a construction upon the fee bill as will give him the greatest amount of fees. The portion of the fee bill which has given rise to greatest contro-versy between these officers and the Comptroller's Office and the Attorney-General's Office than any other is that portion which provides for fees for preliminary hearings before United States commissioners.

The language of the old act is:

For hearing and deciding on criminal charges, 85 a day for the time neces-

The committee propose to change that so as to read:

For hearing and deciding on criminal charges, including decketing of same recognizances of defendants, sureties and witnesses, and return to court, and all proceedings thereon, 45 and no more.

The object of putting in this limitation is to cure certain evils which we have found to exist. For instance, notably in Boston, In the case of one commissioner, we found that he was in the habit of fixing a day for a preliminary hearing and then, either because of some engagement of his own, some arrangement between him and the deputy marshal, or some combination between ween him and the deputy marshal, or some combination between him and other parties for fee-making, the case would be adjourned to another day, and, as he was entitled under section 847 to $5 a day for each day necessarily employed in these preliminary hearings, he would make a charge of $5 a day for each continuance, and so he would continue the hearing from day to day until he ran up a large bill against the Government, and put it to the expense of witnesses at each one of these preliminary hearings, and of the recognizances binding over the defendant and the witnesses, making separate recognizances for fendant and the witnesses, making separate recognizances for The result was that the fees of the commissioner in each of 356 cases averaged over $16, when the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Attorney-General thought that $5 in each case would have been pay enough for the services rendered.

Mr. TURNER. What is the language recommended by the

Mr. WOLVERTON. The committee recommend this: For Mr. WOLVERTON. The committee recommend this: For hearing and deciding on criminal charges, including docketing the same, recognizances of defendant, sureties and witnesses, and return to court, and all proceedings thereon, $5 and no more."

Mr. TURNER. I understood it to say "$5a day." I entirely approve of the proposed change.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Another amendment that we propose in this receiver in the contraction of the proposed.

in this section is to cover cases where warrants may be issued and no arrests made, as in cases I have mentioned where the fee is limited to $2.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I am entirely with him in this reform, but I recollect that the commissioner in Boston, to whom he refers, claimed, although it was not allowed by the Attorney-General's Office, that he had a right to collect $5 a day on each case; and while that was not allowed, yet I know that he piled up for his heirs, or whoever should come after him, a lot of claims against the Government based upon that method of charging. If he had a dozen cases before him he wanted to charge $5 a day in each case.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; he claimed that he had a right to do that under the fee bill, and it is to prevent that, and to allow him but $5 for all services at a preliminary hearing in any case that this change is proposed.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. But suppose he has a dozen cases before him? You provide in your amendment for $5 in each case, but your intention ought to be, I think, to make the charge not more than $5 a day. Mr. WOLVERTON.

not more than $5 a day.

Mr. WOLVERTON. For any one case.

Mr. TURNER. Suppose he should have three or four cases a day, would you allow him the $5 in each case?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER. Would not that be liable to abuse?

Mr. WOLVERTON. That would be liable to abuse, but not so much so as if he had five times $5 in each case.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I think it would be well for the amendment to cover both cases.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I think that if the amendment proposed by the committee becomes the law, it will reduce the fees of commissioners 50 per cent throughout the United States.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I am very much opposed to the fee system, and would like to see salaries provided for district attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, if that could be done. Now, can the gentleman tell how much it would increase the cost to the Government to provide salaries instead of fees?

Mr. WOLVERTON. That question was gone into before the

Mr. WOLVERTON. That question was gone into before the Attorney-General, who was represented at some of the hearings, and whose assistance we had and also that of clerks from the Comptroller's Office. But the question was a very large one for this committee to take up and dispose of, and should be very carefully considered. I think it would be well for Congress to have the Attorney-General or the accounting department of the Treasury draw a bill which would cover this question and provide for paying these efficers by salaries rather than fees, but the question is too large a one to be dealt with by this committee in the time devoted to the question.

Mr. DINGLEY. In connection with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEIL] has said, it seems to me to be one of the most desirable pieces of legislation that Congress could take hold of to provide distinct and certain salaries for these officers instead of fees. There are a great many abuses under the present system. While I think the bill reported by the committee is a valuable one, yet we shall not cure the evil thoroughly until we fix distinct salaries for these officers.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] fully, and there is now a bill pending before the Committee on the Judiciary with that end in view; but it is a subject that will have to be gone into very carefully, and a great deal of consultation will have to be had with officials of the Covernment to see that these salaries are not put to low in Government to see that these salaries are not put too low in some cases and too high in others.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Will the ge Will the gentleman pardon me if I make

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Will the gentleman pardon me if I make a suggestion right there?
Mr. WOLVERTON. Certainly.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. I agree with the gentleman, but there are cases that come before United States commissioners where $5 is absolutely no compensation at all, if you limit it to that amount in one case. I know of cases where the commissioner has been in one case. I know of cases where the commissioner has been engaged in the taking of evidence in a preliminary examination for the purpose of determining whether the matter should be brought to the attention of the grand jury, where the examina-tion was continued daily for more than two weeks.

Mr. EVERETT. In good faith?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. In good faith. Now, the committee must see, and everyone must see, that to a commissioner who was competent to investigate a case of that kind $5 would be absolutely no compensation at all. I would suggest to the gentleman, if it is possible, to put in a clause by which the Department of Justice might have a december to ment of Justice might have a discretion, in cases of importance that were brought before commissioners, where the examination was necessarily continued, as appeared by the evidence which was taken before the commissioner, so that additional allowances might be made to the commissioners in such a case.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wol-Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania Mr. WOL-VERTON] will allow me, I will say in reply to that that the com-missioner will have a great many cases which he can dispose of in thirty minutes or an hour, and he would get his allowance of $5; and the general average would come up all right. If you allowed him further compensation on the order of the district attorney, that also might become a subject of abuse.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I am well aware of that fact; but I am well aware also of another fact, that, as an ordinary rule, the commissioners do not receive a compensation from the Government, under the law as it is now, of more than two or three hundred dollars per year, and the compensation has been so ridicu-lously small that it has been very difficult to get a lawyer who was really competent to perform the duties to accept the position

I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that there should be a salary attached to these positions, and that the number of commissioners should be very largely reduced; but it seems to me it would be very unjust in these cases where there is necessarily required on the part of the Government an examination extending over a number of days, without which examination it would be impossible to present the case to a grand jury in order to perfect an indictment—in such cases it would be very unjust to limit the commissioner to so small a compensa-

Mr. WOLVERTON. There is no doubt that there may be exceptional cases, but our examination shows that in the 2,600 cases that were before one commissioner in Massachusetts-who seemed to do all the commissioners' business for some reason, by some arrangement between the marshals and deputy-marshals and himself, although there were eighteen commissioners in that State—there were only two or three cases of the kind mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Lockwoop] which would require more than a day's services on the part of the commissioner.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Take the case there in Boston, of the Maverick Bank. If that case was properly investigated before a United States commissioner, he certainly could not do it in one day; and no United States attorney would attempt to present that case to a grand jury for indictment without a preliminary examination of some character. In the ordinary cases of bank failures he would not attempt to present the matter to a grand jury without such an examination before the commissioner, so as to avoid any technical errors that might be developed in the prosecution of the case.

Mr. WOLVERTON. With regard to the commissioner in Boston, of whom I am speaking, he had from January, 1884, to January, 1892, a total of 2,532 cases, or an average of 3161 per year. The average fee charged for each case was $16.51 and the average amount allowed by the Comptroller was $3.63. He had charged twice as much, under his construction of the fee bill, as the Attorney-General and the Comptroller's department of the Treasury were willing to allow him, and they claim they allowed everything he was entitled to under a proper construction of the fee bill. And it is due to the Attorney-Generals of the United States, for the last eight or ten years at least, and to every officer of the Comptroller's department of the Treasury, to say that they have done all in their power to correct the abuses that exist all over the United States under this section.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Do you not think they have succeeded pretty well? Mr. WOLVERTON. They have not succeeded to their satisfaction by any means, because it was at their instance that this resolution was offered, and this bill received the approval of the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, as going far to correct the abuses that exist under the present act.

Mr. EVERETT. The gentleman's statement relative to the Attorney-General's Office refers to previous cases.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; the Attorney-Generals have been trying for several years to correct this abuse. It is due to the House to say that some of the United States courts have made rules to some extent looking to the correction of this abuse.

But how did this commissioner in Massachusetts transact his business under this section? Let me show you. Alluding to the number of these arrests, we find that of these cases 207 were for violations of the internal-revenue laws. One hundred and eighty-six of these were compromised before him. Two hundred and fifty-six cases were for illegal registration.

fifty-six cases were for lingua registration.

Of these 256, 79 were sent to court, 74 were discharged by him, and in 103 no arrests were mide at all. They were simply for political purposes preceding elections. This commissioner held the incompatible offices of chief supervisor of elections for the State of Massachusetts, with several assistants, and also the office of United States commissioner.

Mr. MERCER. What was his name?

Mr. WOLVERTON. His name was Hallett; but perhaps I should not mention his name, because I am informed that he is dead. I only use it here to show the manner in which he, perhaps not more than others, was led to construe this provision of the bill differently from what the United States attorneys construed it, and to show how it can be abused by an improper construction of it, and what opportunities are allowed to the fee maker if a commissioner chooses to embrace the opportunities offered him.

Now, Hallet, the chief supervisor of elections, would go across the room to Hallett, the United States commissioner, and inform Hallett, the United States commissioner, that John Jones, somewhere in Massachusetts, had illegally registered. been a banker having a summer residence there, or in other parts of the State, as in one instance a professor of a college who happened to live somewhere else during the summer months. Hallett, the commissioner, would take into consideration the information brought before him by Hallett, the chief supervisor of elections, and determine whether Hallett, the commissioner, had made out a prima facie case for the court, and to determine whether Hallett, the supervisor of elections, had presented such whether Hallett, the supervisor of elections, had presented such information as would justify Hallett, the commissioner, to issue the warrant. Hallett, the supervisor of elections, satisfied Hallett, the commissioner, that warrants ought to be issued in 79 of these cases, but when the hearing came before Hallett, the United States commissioner, Hallett, the supervisor of elections, failed to convince Hallett, the commissioner, that the men ought to be arrested, and therefore he did not issue his warrants in this number of cases. But it is the supervisor of the supervisor of elections, failed to convince Hallett, the commissioner, that the men ought to be arrested, and therefore he did not issue his warrants in this number of cases. But in every case Mr. Hallett, the United States commissioner, sent up to the Comptroller's Department at Washington a bill of $4.15 for fees against the Government of

Never issued a warrant at all, as I said, in these cases; simply walked from one side of the room, we are to presume, as supervisor of elections to consult himself as commissioner, a veritable Pooh-Bah, and in each case presented his bill for $4.15 against the Government.

Mr. EVERETT. A consultation fee.
Mr. MERCER. And all of this under the good old Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; in the good old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, where it is to be presumed that the laws are honestly enforced, if they are enforced anywhere in the United

Mr. CULBERSON. Where it is alleged that they were honestly enforced?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes.

Now, in one hundred and three of these cases, as I have said, no arrest was made at all. Informations were made by Mr. Hullett, the supervisor of elections, before Mr. Hallett, the United States commissioner, but on further consideration of the information so produced the warrants of arrest were not issued.

Nevertheless the $4.15 in each case was charged up against the Government. A large part of the claim was disallowed and suit was brought before the courts in Boston, which decided that he was entitled to recover from the Government this amount.

In seventy-four cases Mr. Hallett, the commissioner, did not believe Mr. Hallett, the supervisor of elections, had sufficient evidence, and so he discharged the parties. This illustrates the abuses which prevailed in Massachusetts, and is likely one of many under existing laws. The fees claimed by Mr. Hallett for services in these cases amounts to $41,801.38. The Government allowed him $21,864.73 and disallowed $19,936.65, for which he has sued the Government and recovered independ for a part of as sued the Government and recovered judgment for a part of the disallowed claim at least; because, under the ruling of the courts the more pro forma approval of a bill by United States commissioners or of the clerks of the court gives them a prima facie claim against the Government, and suits were brought and judgments obtained in several instances, and there is litigation in reference to the balance now going on.

It is said by the accounting department that there was some defect in the cases stated for the consideration of the court, and you know how that affects a final determination of the court where the action is founded on a case stated. The above sum of $41,801.38 did not include $2,678.10 which he received on account of settlements in internal-revenue cases. So that the entire amount received by this commissioner in Boston from the United States was $24,542.83 for eight years or $3,067.85 a year. This was not all the fees, however, this commissioner received. As supervisor of elections he sent in a bill for one year alone of about $11,000, and the Government allowed him some $3,500, I believe. I think a suit has also been brought for the balance of that. So you can see the amounts which have accrued in the way of fees by this construction of the law in this case, which may be only one of many similar cases.

Ma

It is a curiosity, Mr. Speaker, to see just how he makes up the statements of $4.15, thus returned to the Government for services rendered in each of these cases where he made no arrest and had no hearing, but only considered the case presented before himself by himself. It is a curiosity. It is made up as follows:

Now, it would take a great deal of ingenuity, it seems to me, on the part of the most astute lawyer to figure out of that fee bill $4.15, for no services whatever rendered, and make up the taxation of fees in the two other cases. In one case $58.15 were taxed up and the docket showed only three hearings. There were 103 cases of that same kind, as covered by the first docket entry, where there was no arrest and no service rendered, except the mere information which Mr. Hallett made before Mr. Hallett.

Mr. RAY. You made up your minds that this was a case where the law was abused, did you not?
Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. Now, is not the just conclusion this, that you are seeking, by changing the law to prevent the possibility of abuses of this kind by working great hardship on the great mass of Government officials? The cases where the law has been abused es very few indeed.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Not at all.
Mr. WOLVERTON. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] that this instance of abuse in Massachusetts, to which our attention was directed particularly, is not the only one; but the abuse of this fee bill by commissioners of the United States and the practice of fee-making by them is complained of as existing to a greater or less extent all over the United States; and there are cases in Georgia and in Alabama where the marshals and commissioners have combined together and abused legal process perhaps to a greater extent than prevails in Massachusetts.

Mr. RAY. Conceding that to be the fact, could not there be some provision put in this bill by which an honest official, who spends several days in investigating a case, could be paid for his services and receive proper compensation upon the certificate of

Mr. WOLVERTON. In reply to the gentleman, I would say that I can see no objection to such a provision, or what is better, the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. CULBERSON]. There is a bill now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary looking to the making it a salthe Committee on the Judiciary looking to the making it as alaried office. The cases are so numerous where the hearing occupies only a few minutes, or at most an hour, that the fees received in the cases that require but little attention ought to compensate the commissioner for a case now and then which requires a greater length of time.

Mr. RAY. So you think in the end he would get his just dues?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I think in the end the commissioners will get their full dues.

I would say that this same abuse prevails in my own State in some cases. Complaint has been made of commissioners in Illinois and other States of the continuances of hearings by commissioners in order to enable the commissioner to get his $5 missioners in order to enable the commissioner to get his $5 a day, and to pay witness fees to his friends and the friends of the marshal, to testify to something they know nothing about for the sake of receiving witness fees and mileage, 5 cents a mile coming and going. The abuse prevails all over the country. Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. That is the natural tendency of the fee system?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EVERETT. Have the committee made any investigation in the same direction as this in other States?

Mr. WOLVERTON. A committee appropriate for the same

Mr. WOLVERTON. A committee appointed for the same purpose by the Fifty-first Congress, of which committee I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Oates] is the only member now serving in this Congress, made an extended examination into this question, not only in the Boston case, but in cases in Alabama, Georgia, and different States of the South, where they found instances where they would arrest men at the seat of government, as they did in Boston, and pass by twenty or more commissioners, and go to a far corner of the State, 250 miles, the officer getting 5 cents per mile up and 5 cents a mile back, or 10 back if he brought the prisoner, bringing him across the whole length of the State for the sake of making fees against the Government; and not only that, but compelling the witnesses to come, and his bail to come, subjecting the defendants to great hardships; and in one instance, I believe, they developed the fact that a combination existed between the defendant, the witnesses, the marshal, and the commissioner, by which even the bail were arrested, when they got half-way home, and brought back to justify, because of some misstatements as to their qualifications

Mr. EVERETT. And the distances are greater in the Southern States than they are in Massachusetts, so the abuse would be greater. r. WOLVERTON. Yes.

Mr. OATES. With the gentleman's permission, I bear willing testimony to the facts as he has stated them, and I will state that there have been even greater abuses, and the measure the gentleman is advocating is as mild a way of treating these abuses as is at all effectual. In fact this measure might be made more extreme.

Mr. WOLVERTON. We meant to remedy this as far as we could at this time, and to call the attention of Congress to the fact that some further remedy and restriction should be passed in order to correct these abuses. If anyone will look at the testimony, which will be found in connection with the report, No. 1966 of the Fifty-second Congress, and then will look at the testimony. timony, which is much more voluminous, accompanying the report made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], I think anyone will be satisfied that this bill is very mild, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] states, and that there should be even more restraint than this bill as amended will im-

Now, the next section, the fourth section of this bill, which proposes to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, relates to an abuse that has existed and now exists in all the States, of arresting a person charged with an offense against the United States in one part of the State, generally at the seat of govern-ment, and sending a marshal past other commissioners, who have jurisdiction of the case also, and bringing the defendant through the whole State to this one commissioner for a hearing, to give bail, to be bound over to court or committed, instead of taking him, as the laws generally require, to the nearest competent him, as the laws generally require, to the nearest competent officer to give him a proper hearing.

There is, perhaps, as much or more abuse by the marshals and deputy marshals under this section than by commissioners under section 847. A provision was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill in the last Congress providing that if a marshal or officer having charge of a warrant violated the provision in the appropriation bill which required him to take the offender to the nearest officer having jurisdiction, that he should forfeit all mileage. The section, as we have amended it here, provides that he shall take the offender, or the alleged offender, who may in any instance be innocent, to the nearest officer having jurisdiction of such offenses, to give him a hearing and have him many instance of innocent, to the hearest officer having jurisdiction of such offenses, to give him a hearing and have him committed to prison if he can not give bail, admitted to bail, or discharged, as the facts may justify.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow me just there, I have very recently, within the last ten days, had information from my State of several cases where officers have arrested alloged offenders against the liquor laws 130 miles from Monta. alleged offenders against the liquor laws, 130 miles from Mont-gomery, arrested them upon warrants obtained from a commisgomery, are steed them upon warrants obtained from a commissioner at Montgomery, and although there are judges and officers of ability willing to hear these cases, they have carried them all the way to Montgomery to be investigated, and about one out of every ten has been bound over and the others found to be guiltless and discharged.

Mr. CULBERSON. They are not could be a commission.

Mr. CULBERSON. They are not entitled to get any pay for that service

Mr. OATES. They have been rendering accounts for it.
Mr. CULBERSON. The law passed at the last Congress provides expressly that they shall not be paid for any services of that sort

Mr. OATES. Is my friend aware of the fact that this law, which is intended to make them take the arrested party before the nearest officer to save expense, has received a construction, first, in the Treasury Department by one of the accounting officers, which has been subsequently approved by the Attorney-General, who holds that it is in the discretion of the arresting

Mr. CULBERSON. The law expressly declares that if an of-ficer who arrests an alleged offender shall carry him beyond any officer who has jurisdiction of the offense, that no pay shall be allowed, and how the Attorney-General can construe a statute so plain as that as to vest discretion in the officer I can not see

Mr. OATES. I am so much in accord with the opinion given by my friend from Texas that I gave an opinion before this session began last spring to some people interested in this matter. I stated that that was the law, yet this construction has come along since, and runs contrary to that opinion.

Mr. WOLVERTON. These four amendments suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary were embodied in four bills, as I stated, at the last session of Congress, and were passed unanimously by the thick the last session of congress, and were passed unanimously by the thick the last session of congress, and were passed unanimously by the contraction. mously by this House, but it was so late in the session that it was feared they would not be reached in the Senate and they were not. This fourth section, to amend section 1014, was included in the appropriation bill on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, because it was needed to meet just this kind of abuse. We have inserted the amendment here to section 1014, because I do not think legislation in appropriation bills is advisable at any time. I do not think it is a good

Mr. LYNCH. It seems to me that section 1014, as found in this bill, will not cure the defect, or prevent the abuse of which you complain, because it does not provide where the process shall issue, whether in the county where the offense was committed or where the defendant resides. It says that the arrest shall be made where he may be found. That is very indefinite.

Mr. CULBERSON. You could hardly arrest him anywhere

Mr. LYNCH. The process should be issued in the county where the offense is committed.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is where the warrant issues.

Mr. LYNCH. It does not provide that. Mr. CULBERSON. That is the law now.
Mr. WOLVERTON. That is the law now.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is the law now.
Mr. LYNCH. Under the amendments of last Congress?
Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. LOCKWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is a fact, as I have understood, that the Committee on the Judiciary have under consideration a bill to abolish the present United States commissioners, all of them, and appoint new commissioners upon salaries?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not know that there is any such bill before the committee. I understand, however, that such a bill has been introduced.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no bill before the committee to abolish the United States commissioners; none whatever; but there is a bill before the committee to change the system of pay ing commissioners, marshals, and district attorneys. That bill has been referred to a subcommittee, and we hope to make a report upon it to this Congress.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. As I understand, United States commissioners can now be appointed without limit by the judges, and the result following upon that is that in the larger cities there are a great many United States commissioners. Now, I agree fully with the purposes of this bill except as to cases in which hardship may be worked. You say here, "Taken before the nearest United States commissioner." Now, in important cases that might not be the proper course to follow, in my judgment, bese the nearest commissioner might be a perfectly worthless fellow, entirely unit to go on with an important examination.

There is where the trouble has grown up from the appointment of commissioners who were not fit to be commissioners, and who were in league with the marshals to work up fees against the Government, whereas men who were fit and competent to be commissioners would not issue warrants except in proper cases. Yet their fees are to be fixed by the rule which applies to those who are guilty of these abuses. The marshal will always go to the commissioner who is in sympathy with him, instead of to a man who may perhaps be more competent.

Mr. WOLVERTON. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I would wipe out all the commissioners and have a new deal.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That we can not do in this bill.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. No; but it seems to me that this bill is only a mere skirmish on the outside of the main subject.

Mr. RAY. Let me suggest to my colleague from New York [Mr. Lockwood] whether the best way to get rid of the evil of which he complains, the existence of a great many unfit and worthless commissioners, would not be to compel the taking of criminals before those fellows, thus bringing out the fact that they are unfit? In that way measures could be set on foot to get rid of them.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Well, that would be a pretty hard way of doing it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOLVERTON. The presumption is that the judges will appoint only proper men as commissioners.

Mr. LOCK WOOD. That is the supposition, but the fact does not always agree with it.

Mr. MALLORY. Then Mr. MALLORY. There is a bill now pending for the ap-pointment of United States commissioners, instead of by the judges. Mr. LOCKWOOD. I think that either the President or the Department of Justice should have the appointment, and then I would give those commissioners power sufficient so that they could discharge these people, and not drag innocent witnesses from one end of a State to another.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I think that every member of this House, especially if he is a lawyer, will recognize the fact that abuses exist in his own district under every section of the statutes that this bill proposes to correct; and while the bill may not be all that is desirable, I feel satisfied it will prove a great saving to the Government. I will state that we asked the Comptroller and the Attorney-General to revise these fee bills, and they started in to do it, but they found it was a larger job than they had anticipated; and, after waiting a long time, we finally re-ported this bill as a means of temporarily restraining these imported this bill as a means of temporarily restraining these improper charges against the Government.

Mr. RAY. Is it not true that this bill was reported to the House from the Judiciary Committee unanimously?

Mr. WOLVERTON. It is. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee. The bill has the approval of the Attorney-General and also of the First Comptroller and of the expert leaks it his department. clerks in his department.

The SPEAKER. Is there any amendment to the bill?

Mr. WOLVERTON. No, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time;

and being engressed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. WOLVERTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. GEARY (when the Committee on Interstate Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersay.

The bill was read. An amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Mitted was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided." in line 83, down to and including the word "void." in line 84, and insert: "and within two years after the passage of this act; and said company or companies shall expend within the first year after construction has commenced, as herein required, not less than $250,000, and in each year thereafter not less than $10,000,000 in the actual construction work of said bridge; which shall be reported to the Secretary of War; and the said bridge shall be completed within ten years from the commencement of the construction of the same, as herein required; otherwise this act shall be null and void."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, there was an amendment to that bill agreed upon and settled between myself and the gentlethat bill agreed upon and settled between myself and the gentle-man from California [Mr. Geary] who has called up the bill this morning, but I find that that amendment, in my own handwrit-ing, has been torn off from the bottom.

Mr. DUNPHY. If the gentleman will indicate the amend-ment we will put it in.

Mr. WARNER. I will explain what it was, although, as I kept no copy, leaving the original in possession of the commit-tee, I shall not be able to give the precise words.

The amendment as it now reads provides for an expenditure

The amendment as it now reads provides for an expenditure of $250,000 during the first year after the construction is commenced and $1,000,000 thereafter. The clause then follows: "Otherwise this act shall be null and void." As it now reads there might be a question whether the "otherwise" referred simply to the bridge not being completed within ten years or whether it referred to all of the conditions not having been com-

Inasmuch as the arrangement under which the amendment Insmuch as the arrangement under which the amendment was originally proposed by me referred to the bill as it stood, and as it stood the word "otherwise" would apply to all of the conditions. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEARY], in tharge of the matter, agreed with myself that it was not improper that all doubt should be removed by inserting after the word "otherwise" a dash and explanatory words about like these: "that is, unless the construction of said bridge shall be commenced, proceeded with, and completed within the time and at the rate provided for this act shall be null and void." It is that clause. provided for, this act shall be null and void." It is that clause, sir, which has been torn off and which this paper shows was originally there, by the caret with the lines running down to the place where the tear has removed the rest of the amend-

Mr. GEARY. Now, Mr. Speaker, this amendment as offered is the amendment sent by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] and adopted by us; and he then said that with that amendment he was satisfied with this bill. Two or three days afterward he asked for the bill and wanted to add these words. He came over and talked about it; and as I understood from him, he and I agreed that the change suggested would add no weight whatever to the amendment. Now, that has not been taken off with any intention to prevent the gentleman from getting all the security he may imagine necessary. Now, I understood that it was not agreeable, that it was not necessary; because I thought so I withdrew it. You need not get indignant [addressing Mr. WARNER] over the matter; if you want those amendments now, I say we will accept the amendments; but my understanding was you did not think such an amendment necessary.

Mr. WARNER. Then I ask first that they accept the amendment. And I state that the gentleman is mistaken. As a matter of actual fact the gentleman asked me hurriedly to give my views as to a certain proposition which he dictated and I wrote down. I told him that in that respect it was satisfactory to me, but that I would call his attention the next morning to matters that struck me as being necessary to be inserted. I did so. He then brought me, for the first time, after the meeting of his committee, the clause which has just been read. I endeavored to get a copy of that. I was unable to do so. I do not lay it to the gentleman; but I am explaining the circumstances. It was not until several days afterward that finally he brought me a copy.

I pointed out to him just what I have pointed out to the House I pointed out to him just what I have pointed out to the mouse this morning, that there might be a misunderstanding which, instead of making that amendment a good thing for the bill, would really make it a better thing for the promoters of this bridge. He agreed with me that there could be no objection to inserting the words which would make plain the object of the amendment. I then and there wrote upon the amendment the words which, since they have passed into his possession, have been torn off. I accept the proposition to incorporate in the amendment the words which I will dictate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. WARNER (dictating to the Clerk)-

Insert after the word "otherwise" the words "that is, unless the actual construction of said bridge shall be commenced, proceeded with, and completed within the time and at the rate above provided for"— and I leave the House to decide what they want to do with this

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Speaker, I have reported this bill to the House from the Committee on Commerce. It does not concern my people; and I have no interest in its passage or its defeat. After Mr. WARNER made his objection the other day, I methim late in the afternoon and said to him: "I supposed this bill was agreeable to everybody in New York; it was so represented to the committee by different interests." This amendment was then suggested by the gentleman [Mr. WARNER] and the amend-ment was approved of by me, and the bill sent back to this House from that committee. Afterward, the bill having been here two or three days—no attempt made to passit—he suggested this additional matter—wrote it on the bill, which he had in his desk, not in mine, I having sent it over the day before—

Mr. WARNER rose

Mr. GEARY. Did you not have it at all?
Mr. WARNER. I never had it except when it was handed to me with that amendment written upon it; you had it in your possession; I never had it from the very moment when the original matter was submitted to me. And I want to say that the gentleman is incorrect in stating that that amendment was agreed to by me and submitted to the committee. It is an amendment which was drawn by the committee, and which I never saw until which was drawn by the committee, and which I never saw until after the committee had adjourned for that morning. And it was because, not of any question as to what was agreed to, but as to the phraseology by which that agreement should be carried out, that I tried to find the gentleman for several days afterward. When he did appear I asked him for the bill. It was not in my desk; he had had it; he brought it to me. I called his attention to the matter; he agreed with me, as I understood; and in any case he handed me the bill for the purpose. I wrote in the bill the words I have dictated to the Clerk, as well as I could remember them, indicating their place, and it turns up with the words torn off this morning.

Mr. GEARY. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York is mistaken. That bill was in his own possession, because York is mistaken. That bill was in his own possession, because I went to that desk and took it out and left the bill with the gentleman, and did not see it at all myself afterwards until this

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I sent a page to ask the gentleman for the bill, and the page came back to me with the word that the gentleman would bring it to me himself. But he did not. Mr. GEARY. Now. M

Mr. GEARY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will state the facts to be that I took the bill and gave it to the gentleman; went to that desk over there; got it out and left it on his desk. You (referthe day, and I think all of it, because I said I was going out of the Capitol and would not probably return here. Afterwards you called attention to the advisability of making the change which you had written on the bill, and I, sitting at that desk, or at your desk, discussed with you the necessity for it, and came to the conclusion that you yourself did not deem it necessary to insert it in the bill. sary to insert it in the bill.

Now, my statement is just as good as yours, I submit to the House, and they can decide it. After we had agreed that it was not necessary, because I believe you did not regard it as necessary, I myself took it off, and that bill has been in the possession of the House ever since.

Now, I do not care about your amendment. I have been willing, as far as I had authority to do so, to accept any amendment offered by anybody that would protect the parties, the Government, and the State. The gentleman will not deny that.
Mr. WARNER. You have always professed it, sir.
Mr. GEARY. I have so stated; and I understood that the gentleman did not regard this matter as necessary

Now, I do not care about the bill; it is not one of mine. It is a matter in which I have no personal interest. I am not willing that the gentleman from New York shall endeavor to impress upon this House the idea that I have been guilty of any intention of misleading him or anybody else, or that I have purposely done something that did mislead him. I do not want any reflections of that character to be made upon me by the gentleman tions of that character to be made upon the by the from New York or by anybody else.

Mr. WARNER. The "gentleman from New York" will not make any reflections whatever. But the facts are as I have stated them, as shown by the gentleman's own statement. These words were put in the bill by an understanding with the gentleman bimself. The bill has not been in my possession. I have man himself. The bill has not been in my possession. not seen it until this morning, when it turns up with these words torn off.

That is all I desire to say.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, let us have the amendment read as it will stand if the amendment of the gentleman from New York is adopted.

The amendment as proposed to be amended was read, as fol-

Strike out, in line 83, all after the word "Provided," and insert:
"And within two years after the passage of this act; and said company or companies shall expend within the first year after construction has conmenced, as herein required, not less than $250,000, and in each year thereafter not less than $1.000,000 in the actual construction of the work of said bridge, which shall be reported to the Secretary of War, and the said bridge shall be completed within ten years from the commencement of the construction of the same as herein required; otherwise, that is, unless the actual construction of said bridge shall be commenced, proceeded with, and completed within the time and rate above provided for, this act shall be null and void.

The amountment to the provided for, this act shall be null and void.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GEARY a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. UPDEGRAFF, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. Russellof Georgia, for two weeks after Monday next, on account of important business.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. This committee recommends the adoption of a substitute for a resolution referred to them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. STALLINGS, respectfully report that they have examined into and considered the same, and offer the following substitute and recommend its pasered the same, and one of the thirty-six clerks to the comittees of the House age:

"Resolved, That one of the thirty-six clerks to the comittees of the House during the sessions provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, be, and is hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the Committee on Education;

and and "Resolved, That the pay of said clerk shall begin from the time such clerk entered upon the discharge of his duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of the committee."

The original resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk for the sessions of the Fifty-third Congress, such employment to date from August 21, 1893, to be paid 86 per day, as other session clerks are paid.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I will state that there are sixteen of the clerks, provided for in the appropriation bill of last year, who are unassigned. This report assigns one of those clerks to the Committee on Education. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question for

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. SIMPSON. Do these clerks draw pay before they are assigned to duty?

Mr. RUSK. They draw pay from the time they enter upon Mr. SIMPSON. They draw pay when they are assigned to duty on a committee? Yes. Mr. RUSK.

Mr. SIMPSON. I understand this resolution says they shall draw pay from the lat of August?

Mr. RUSK. No, that was the original proposition, in place of which a substitute is offered by which we designate one of the clerks already appropriated for, instead of a clerk to be paid out of the contingent found. of the contingent fund.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. RUSK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of bills on the Union Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, with

Mr. Dockery in the chair.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I moved to strike out sections 62 to 73, inclusive. I have conferred with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in regard to those sections, and I find that only sections 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, and 69 relate to the new offices proposed to be created by this bill. I therefore withdraw the motion which I made yesterday, to strike out all the sections mentioned, and move to strike out only section 62; but I ask unanimous consent that that motion shall apply also to sections 63, 66, 67, 68, and 69.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion, to strike out section 62, is pending. The Chair understands the gentleman now to ask unanimous consent that the motion to strike out apply also to the other sections mentioned.

Mr. FITHIAN. To sections 63, 66, 67, 68; and 69 also.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to it. On the other hand, I state that those sections are the sections which create and deal with the contemplated new officers, and inasmuch as there seems to be opposition to the provision in that respect, I consent that those sections may be stricken out, on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the motion to strike out apply to those sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that, and I notonly agree that it may apply to those sections, but that they may go out of the bill, in order that every part of the bill which The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now suggest to the

The Chair will now suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that the other sections be read by the Clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I see no use in reading

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I see no use in reading them again, because there is no controversy over them now. The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They were read last night and printed in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. FITHIAN. Sections 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, and 69 are the sections covered by my motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] to strike out the sections was agreed to. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further, I move to strike out section 64, which fore proceeding luriner, I move to strike out section 64, which is not included in the sections which the gentleman from Illinois has included in his motion, and insert the substitute which I had printed in the RECORD this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 64 has not been read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know it has not been read; and I want it read now, so as to make my motion to strike

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 64. The superintendent of documents is also charged with the sale of public documents, except as herein otherwise provided; and all documents hitherto published for sale by other offices of the Government shall be turned over to him. He is hereby authorized to sell any publication of the Government at cost, as estimated by the Public Printer, and based upon printing from stereotyped plates, excepting old and rare volumes, which shall be sold at an appraised value, to be determined by the superintendent of documents, the Fublic Printer, and the Librarian of Congress, acting as a commission for this purpose; but only one copy of any document shall be sold to the same individual, excepting in the case of libraries or schools, by which additional copies are desired for separate departments thereof. All moneys received from the sale of documents shall be covered into the Treasury monthly and placed to the credit of the general fund for public printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, the section I offer as a substitute for the section just read, changes that section so as to make it apply to the superintendent of docu-ments now in the Interior Department instead of the officer contemplated in the new section of the bill. I ask to have read the substitute which I offer, and which appears on page 2741 of the substitute which I offer, and which appears on page 2741 of the RECORD this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC 64. The suferintendent of documents is hereby authorized to sell st cost any public document in his charge, the distribution of which is not herein specifically directed, said cost to be estimated by the Public Printer and based upon printing from stereotyped plates: but only one copy of any document shall be sold to the same person, excepting libraries or schools by which additional copies are desired for separate departments thereof; and whenever any officer of the Government having in his charge documents pulsade for sale shall desire to be relieved of the same, he is hereby authorized to turn them over to the superintendent of documenta, who shall receive and sell them under the provisions of this section. All moneys received from the sale of documents shall be covered into the Treasury quarterly and placed to the credit of the general fund for public printing, and the superintendent of documents shall report annually the number of copies of each and every document sold by him, and the price of the same. He shall also report annually the number of documents received by him and the disposition made of the same.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the super-intendent of documents named in this section, of course, applies to that officer now in the Interior Department, and who has been there for many years; but, in order to obviate any question that may arise, inasmuch as in one section stricken out another super-intendent of documents is mentioned, I move to amend the sub-stitute by adding in the first line, after the words "superin-tendent of documents," the words "in the Interior Department." Then it will show very clearly that it means the present officer. The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that amendment will be considered and agreed to.

There was no objection. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The object of this section as I offered it is simply to give an opportunity to persons to secure documents that they desire to pay for. If they want them, they can go to the officer and buy such as he has on hand.

Mr. PICKLER. Why make a restriction that no one shall be able to obtain more than one copy?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is to prevent speculation. We did not want to leave an opportunity for a second-hand bookseller to go there and buy a whole stock and open store, but we desire to make them go as far as they possibly can. Mr. PICKLER. Does not the gentleman think that this is too restrictive. Suppose a member of Congress wants to buy a dozen volumes, why shall he not have the privilege of distributing them among his constituents. I suppose you wanted to prevent speculation in large lots being purchased?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all.

Mr. PICKLER. I am perfectly willing if the gentleman will say not to exceed a dozen.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing insert after the designation that they shall not be sold to the same persons, except libraries or schools for which additional copies are desired now, the words "or members of Congress."

I will agree to that.

Mr. PICKLER. I will accept that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think that would cover what the gentleman desires. After the word "thereof" add the words "or members of Congress" on line 6.

Mr. PICKLER. Would it not be better to make it to "Government officials?"

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think so. They can get them printed on their requisition if they need them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the substitute as modified.

The substitute as modified was read.

Mr. PICKLER. One more question. I see in the third line of the section, "All documents hitherto published for sale by other officers of the Government shall be turned over to him." Does that include any of those volumes in the basement about which we have heard so much here?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You are now reading the text of the bill for which I have offered this substitute.

words you read do not appear in the substitute.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not know that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman, however, that it does not include those books.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is an amendment admissible now?

The CHAIRMAN. One amendment to the substitute is in

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I desire to offer an amendment, then.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 64 by adding the words:

"Itshall be the duty of the superintendent of documents, within thirty days after the approval of this act, to prepare a catalogue of the hundreds of thousands of volumes now held in reserve and unavailable for distribution, and which catalogue shall be made accessible to all Senators, Representatives and Delegates; and he shall apportion each and every sort of book and document equally among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask my friend to withhold his amendment, because I have a section which covers that very point, and much more fully, I think.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withholds his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the modified substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 65. The superintendent of documents shall, at the close of each regular session of Congress, prepare and publish a comprehensive index of public documents, beginning with the Fifty-second Congress, upon such plan as shall be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing; and the Public Printer shall, immediately upon its publication, deliver to him a copy of each and every document printed by the Government Printing Office; and the head of each of the Executive Departments, Bureaus, and offices of the Government shall deliver to him a copy of each and every document issued or published by such Department, Bureau, or office not confidential in its character. He shall also prepare and print in one volume a consolidated index of Congressional documents, and shall index such single volumes of documents as the Joint Committee on Printing shall direct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to strike out of

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to strike out of section 65 all after the word "character," in line 12. I do that because it relates to the preparation of a consolidated index by the new officer that was contemplated, under the direction of the joint committee, and that will not be needed as the bill stands.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, Idesire to call the attention of Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to one more point in connection with this section. It mentions the Fifty-second Congress, but I think it should mention also the Fifty-third Congress, and that (a point which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was intending to reach) these things should be attended to within 30 days from the approval of this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It begins with the Fifty-second Congress, but it goes on through the Fifty-third and thereafter. It begins with the Fifty-second Congress because there is a catalogue for the Congresses prior to that.

Mr. COFFEEN. I suppose that will reach the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COFFEEN. I suppose that will reach the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 70. All documents at present remaining in charge of the several Executive Departments, Bureaus, and offices of the Government not required for official uses shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents, and hereafter all public documents accumulating in said Departments, Bureaus, and offices not needed for official use shall be annually turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution or sale. The Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House shall cause an invoice to be made of all books stored in and about the Capitol other than those belonging to the quota of members of Congress and Delegates and to the Senate library; and all such documents, unless ordered to be retained by the chairmen of committees by which they have been stored, shall be transferred to the superintendent of documents for distribution and sale, as provided in this act, and such invoicing and transfer shall be made annually hereafter.

Where, in the division among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of extra copies of documents printed for the use of Congress, there shall be a remainder beyond the number of 25 to each House of Congress, the surplus beyond 25 shall be turned over by the superintendents of the folding rooms to the superintendent of documents from accumulations thereof in the Executive Departments, or received from officers of the two Houses, shall be distributed by him, first to public and school libraries for the purpose of completing broken sets; second, to public and school libraries that have not been supplied with any portion of such sets; and, third, to other parties, which persons and libraries shall be named to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress; and in this distribution the superintendent of documents shall see that as far as possible an equal allowance is made to each member of Congress;

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that section, because it also relates to work by the new officer that was contemplated, and in lieu of it I offer the amendment which will be found printed on page 2625 of this morning's RECORD, and which I ask to have read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 70 and substitute in its place three sections, as follows (sections 68, 69, 70):

"Sec. 68. The Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall cause an involve to be made of all public documents stored in and about the Capitol, other than those belonging to the quote of members of the present Congress, to the Library of Congress and the Senate and House libraries, and all such documents shall by the superintendents, respectively of the Senate and House folding rooms be put to the credit of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the present Congress, in quantities equal in the number of volumes and as nearly as possible in value, to each member of Congress, and said documents shall be distributed upon the orders of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, each of whom shall be supplied by the superintendents of the folding rooms with a list of the number and character of the publications thus put to his credit: Provided, That before said apportionment is made copies of any of these documents desired for the use of committees of the Senate or House shall be delivered to the chairmen of such committees:

And provided further, That 4 copies of each and all leather-bound documents shall be reserved and carefully stored, to be used hereafter in supplying deficiencies in the Senate and House libraries caused by wear or loss.

"Sec. 69. All documents at present remaining in charge of the several Executive Departments, bureaus, and offices of the Government not required for official use shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents, and hereafter all public documents as commisting in said Departments, bureaus, and offices not needed for official use shall be annually turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution or sale.

"Sec. 69. All documents for distribution or sale.

"Sec. 70. Where, in the division among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of extracoples of d

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This amendment provides for the distribution of the vast surplus of books and documents in the vaults which do not belong to the quotas of members.

Mr. PICKLER. Who makes this distribution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is to be made by the Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesses. It is to be made by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and by the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House, they first to cause a catalogue to be made of these documents in order that members may see what we have, and then they are directed to make the distribution among Senators and Members, giving each one an equal number of documents and as near as may be of equal value. This distribution is reported for in the manner that cartlevant have distribution is provided for in the manner that gentlemen have claimed it ought to be made, that is, by our own officers, rather than by the new clerk contemplated in the bill. What I have just said applies to section 68.

The next section provides that documents remaining in charge of the several Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government, not required for their official use, shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents (in the Interior Department of course), and shall be disposed of by him; the object being to get rid of the surplus of documents in the Departments which has accumulated from time to time, and which are not needed there. The next section provides for the distribution of the remainder after the division has been made among members.

Mr. PICKLER. The language of section 69 offered by the gentleman provides, as I gather from the reading, that these documents shall be turned over to the superintendent "for distribution or sale.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That section provides a manner of disposing of the surplus which will remain after the manner of disposing of the surplus which will remain after the distribution pro rata among Members and Senators.

For instance, let us assume that 2.000 copies of a document are printed for the use of the House. That number is to be divided by 350, because we have that many Members and Delegates. Now, if the remainder is 350 copies, those are not appropriated or assigned to members, but they remain in the hands of the Doorkeeper, or they get lost in some way. There is no account taken of them. The distributing officer does not commence at the top of the alphanet and run down until all the downents are disof them. The distributing officer does not commence at the top of the alphabet and run down until all the documents are distributed, leaving somebody at the bottom with less than those above him. That would be unfair. Therefore he makes the division by giving all the members the same number, and the remainder is not accounted for.

In one session of Congress that remainder, undivided and unassigned, has amounted to over 50,000 copies. Now, this section deals with that surplus, and it does it in this manner: It provides that wherever, after the division is made, this remainder exceeds twenty-five, the surplus over and above twenty-five shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents in the Inte-

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Does it say in the Interior Department?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not say that, but there is no other superintendent of documents. It provides that the surplus exceeding twenty-five shall be turned over to him for distribution or sale.

Mr. PICKLER. How does he distribute them under this provision?

vision?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He distributes them first to libraries, giving preference to those designated by members of Congress, and then, if there are any left over, the gentleman from South Dakota, or anybody else, or any librarian comes along and wants to buy extra copies he is authorized to sell them.

Mr. PICKLER. Will not that cause a large accumulation of documents with him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It will cause an accumula-tion of all over twenty-five of each document under this provi-sion, but as the thing stands now that surplus goes nowhere. We want these surplus documents to go to him so that he may have them to supply vacancies in libraries or to sell them rather than to have them lost and no account taken of them at all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] may have five minutes more. On this bill he has to do more talking talking than all the rest of us put together.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentluman from Tennessee whether there is now such an office known to the law as the superintendent of documents?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; it has been in existence for a great many years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Is it known by that title?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; the officer is known as superintendent of documents in the Interior Depurtment. He is appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and has his office in that Department. He distributes the census reports and a great many other documents. He is the distributing agent for these designated depositories that we have been talking about so much in connection with this bill.

One word more. Of these documents remaining, 25 are assigned to each member and held to fill any immediate demands. If the copies assigned to any member have been lost or possibly destroyed in the document room, or if there is a miscount, there will be 25 copies from which he can supply the demand upon him. We turn over to this superintendent of documents simply the excess after this allowance of 25.

Mr. COFFEEN. I wish to inquire whether this is the proper time for me to offer an amendment to section 70. Are we considering that section now?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; a substitute for that section is pending.

Mr. COFFEEN. Then I desire to offer an amendment which, as I understood, the chairman of the committee was willing to accept, but which, in framing this substitute, he appears to have overlooked.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let us hear the amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CoF-FEEN] offers the amendment which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

In the substitute as printed in the RECORD, strike out all after the word "law" to the end of the section and insert the following:

"All documents delivered to the superintendent of documents under the provisions of this section shall be divided and placed, subject to the orders of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, as follows: One-third of each kind of document shall be set apart for the use of Senators and two-thirds for the use of Members of the House. Each kind of documents set apart shall be divided as nearly as may be equally among the respective members of each House; and the remainders, if any there be, shall be combined with other similar remainders, and from time to time the combination of remainders shall be again divided equitably as nearly as may be among the members of the Senate and the House, respectively."

Mr. CORFEFEN. This among the members of the Acoustic Among the members of the senate and the House, respectively."

Mr. COFFEEN. This amendment covers the point which came up in discussion here some days ago. The object of the amendment is that these surplus books and documents which are acment is that these surplus books and documents which are accumulated shall, when the distribution is made by the superintendent of documents, be divided into quotas subject to the orders of Congressmen, so that whoever has charge of the distribution of documents shall not first make up complete sets for public school libraries and other libraries, but that all of these documents designed for general distribution shall be subject to the orders of the various members of Congress, that they may judge of the proper distribution of them. It was generally under stood, I think, the other day, that this amendment would be acceptable. I believe the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. Richardson] was willing that it should prevail.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The object of the amendment, as I understand, is to dispose of this surplus, which in drafting the section we provided should be turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution to libraries, etc.

superintendent of documents for distribution to libraries, etc. These surplus books under the amendment will be assigned, as I understand, to members of Congress.

Mr. COFFEEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to the proposition; I am willing that such disposition shall be made of these books. All I want is to make some disposition of this

Mr. COFFEEN. Then, as the amendment appears to be generally acceptable, I ask a vote upon it.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. Coffeen was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move to amend section 69 of the substitute as printed by adding what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the superintendent of documents within thirty days after the approval of this act to prepare a catalogue of the hundreds of thousands of volumes now held in reserve and unavailable for distribution, and which catalogue shall be acceptable to all Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; and he shall apportion each and every sort of book and document equally among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that all books and documents shall be divided equally among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; because I do not believe that Senators are any better than Representatives and Delegates. [Applause.] They do not know the people half so well as we do; and only those whose terms expire on the 4th of March, 1895, have as much use for these documents as we have. [Laughter.] The remainder of them can afford to wait until the next distribution of the reserve books. [Laughter.] The whole theory of distribution hitherto has been absolutely ridiculous. It makes one Senator of the State of New York equal to seventeen Representatives; one Representative in Nevada equal to two Senators; and one Representative in Colorado equal equal to two Senators; and one Representative in Colorado equal to one Senator. [Laughter.] This amendment establishes an equalty of ratios among the Senators, Representatives, and Dele-[Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Restores the parity, so to speak. [Laughter.]
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; that is it. What I want is a square deal and a fair "divy" all around. [Laughter.] This suggestion of mine is in the nature of what the logicians would call an argumentum ad hominem, and it ought to pass nem. con. This is but the beginning of a salutary reform. Laughter.] [Laughter.]

If, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] claims, this bill will enable the Government to save $200,000 annually on its printing alone, it is a most meritorious measure and certainly ought to be enacted into law. If it will rescue from their moldering grave a million books and documents, or even half of that number, and to that extent furnish winter reading and entertainment for the people, it will accomplish great good, although the text thereof may not be quite so thrilling as that of Tom Jones, The Mayor of Castorbridge, Ben Hurr, or King Solomon's Mines. [Laughter.]

Mines. [Laughter.]
We were told the other day that these volumes range in value from $25 down to 10 cents. I was very much impressed with the great wistfulness [laughter] and deep soulfulness [laughter] with which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] propounded his pertinent and far-reaching interrogatory to the chairman of the committee, "How many of these volumes are worth $25 each?" [Laughter.] There was no cynicism, mystery, or metaphysics in that query. It went straight to the core of the question and to the hearts of the members, and was very suggestive of Col. Seller's famous declaration that "there's millions in it." [Laughter.]

In my district—as no doubt in others—there are colleges, academies, high schools, and individuals whose libraries would be both ornamented and improved by the addition of some of these more valuable books. I want my share. [Laughter.]

Lintroduced this amendment because human nature in Congress, like human nature outside these Halls, is possessed of a very strong bias towards the great American game of grab. [Laughter.] If the superintendent of documents is not restrained by this amendment or something like unto it, he will have free rein to play the favorites of this House and of the other.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ARNOLD in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five or ten minutes

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the gentleman will proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Sad and strange as it may seem, kissing goes by favors here as well as elsewhere; and, if this bill passes without this kind of restriction, the statesmen "with a pull" in this House will seize all of the valuable books, and I believe that in the distribution of this vast store of wisdom each and every one of us should have his full quantum of the twenty five-dollar books as well as his pro rata of the dime volumes. I came very near saying "dime novels." I wish some of them were. [Laughter.] I suspect that, as a matter of fact, they are. I am very sure that some of the unique and startling agricultural the-ories evolved from the fertile imaginations of the savants of the Government would appear decidedly novel to the genuine farmers of the country who have grown gray in following the plow and communing with nature. [Renewed laughter.] I am heartily in favor of scattering this pent-up Utica of learning and of art over a smiling land. I would much prefer to see this Congress pass into history as a million-volume Congress rather than a

The sudden, unexpected, and simultaneous distribution of a million volumes over this country would have a healthy educational effect on the public mind, and is in direct line with that campaign of education which we have been conducting with so much enthusiasm for lo! these many years in this country, and which was crowned last November with such glorious results [laughter on the Republican side], and which is now being frit-

tered away somewhat. [Renewed laughter.]
A great many people have an erroneous idea that all Government publications are as dry as a powder magazine, a proposi-tion in Euclid, or Tupper's poems. [Laughter.] This free gift of the wisdom of the fathers will explode that impression at once. Some Government works are things of beauty and joys forever. [Laughter.] I once wrote to Senator VEST and requested him to send me any literature he might have in stock, and he sent me two large and handsome volumes on what the scientists call entomology, but what we plain people call bug-ology [laughter], each warranted to contain ten thousand illus-trations. [Laughter.]

That was certainly a big haul—twenty thousand bugs out of

That was certainly a one mail bag. [Laughter.]
This was not all, however, that I owed to the discriminating taste of the Senator and to the boundless generosity of Uncle Sam, for at the same time I was the happy recipient of two huge and gorgeous tomes containing a splendid steel engraving of every species of snake that went with Noah into the Ark. [Laughter.]

My little three-year old boy, from constant playing with these books, has come to know more about snakes and bugs than any gentleman who has not toyed too long with that seductive and bewildering beverage known as Moxican pulque. [Laughter.] That brilliant and exceedingly interesting work, evolved from the inner consciousness of "Our Uncle" Jerry Rusk, concerning hawks and owls, has had such an unprecedented run, which can not be predicted even for Gen. Lew. Wallace's Prince of India laughter], that there will have to be a new and enlarged edition of it published to satisfy the craving of the people for the good, the beautiful, and the true. [Laughter.] I really think, Mr. Chairman, that Longfellow must have had in his mind this buried literary treasure-trove that is concealed down here in the vaults of the Capitol when he wrote those lines:

Nothing useless is or low; Each thing in its place is best; And what seems but idle show Strengthens and supports the rest.

[Laughter.] I urge immediate action on this bill. If we can not give the people that increase in the circulating medium of which they are in sore need [laughter] and for which they are so clamorous, we certainly can give them a million books which they paid for years ago. I express this hope with some confidence, because I can not, to save my life, see how the money power has any interest in obstructing this measure. [Laughter.] If it had, I interest in obstructing this measure. [Laughter.] If it had, I would despair, for it seems to run things here. In making this distribution, Mr. Chairman, we can plant ourselves fearlessly and firmly on the maxim—

He gives twice who gives quickly.

[Applause.] Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask to have the amendment of the gentleman reported again.

The amendment of Mr. Clark of Missouri was again read.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand this relates to the books mentioned in section 59, and there is no objection to it, as it relates to that section.

In regard to the books in the vaults, I have never looked at them and I do not know anything about their value. But inasmuch as the remark I made as to their value has been commented upon several times, I desire to state the ground upon which I base the statement that some of them are worth $25 apiece. The joint committee called before them, when we were preparing this bill, a gentleman of this city who deals very largely in Government publications, Mr. Lowdermilk, who is probably known to many of you gentlemen—a man of superior intelligence and a first-class business man. While he was before the committee he testified as to these books that are stored in the vaults of the Capitol that do not belong to the quota of members. The chairman of the committee asked him this question:

There is an enormous accumulation of what are known as the reserve documents; they have been emptied out of the committee rooms of both Houses, and that has been a necessity. You take our own committee room, where perhaps we have more books than in any of the other committee rooms of the senate, simply because we have not the space to put them. Only the last session we had to clean out all the reserve documents that antedated the Forty-seventh Congress, so that we have here only the modern publications, and the difficulty is to find a place of storage or a receptacle for this vast accumulation, for it is enormous, even a single set of reserve documents.

And Mr. Lowdermilk replied:

But I think you ought to have a building devoted to that purpose alone. Books that are now rotting away will be worth their weight in silver after a while. Some of those books to-day are worth $25 or $30 a volume.

That is on page 251 of the report, and is a quotation from Mr. Lowdermilk's testimony. Now, I ask that the amendment be voted upon and let us proceed.

The amendment was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.
The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as SEC 71. A catalogue of Government publications shall be prepared by the superintendent of documents on the first day of each month, which shall be printed in the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, and during sessions of Congress also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and shall show the documents printed during the month, where obtainable, and the price thereof. On the first day of July of each year he shall prepare and print in pamphle for distribution and sale 2,000 copies of a catalogue of Government publications issued during the year, giving the price of each and where purchasable.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, do these 2,000 catalogues give the people of the country any knowledge of what they can get in the way of Government publications? It seems to me this is an extraordinarily small number.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is simply to give the members of this House and of the Senate, and those interested and the libraries, some notice of what has been published. The superintendent of documents fixed that number, and said it would be as many as we would need.

Mr. PICKLER. It does not give the people any knowledge, unless a larger number is printed.

The Clerk read sections 72, 73, and 74.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, the reading clerk had gone over sections 72 and 73 before I noticed it, and there is one point to which I wish to refer. In section 72 it is provided that—

Said copies shall be distributed by the superintendent of documents to free public libraries having more than 1,000 volumes, etc.

Does that interfere in any manner with the Congressmen drawing their quota of these documents for general distribution? We have been aiming to make members of Congress in both Houses responsible for the proper distribution of these publications, and my amendment has already been carried, which will do that.

It is correct, as we have already decided in the amendment that I have offered and which has been carried, that the surplus books for distribution shall all be subject to the orders of Congressmen. I want that plan of distribution still to prevail; and if the chairman of the committee will give me a moment of his attention I think it would be best to strike out this provision to distribute by the superintendent of documents to public libraries having more than a thousand volumes other than Gov-ernment publications in their libraries, and let these documents all go through the members of Congress

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That amendment ought not apply here, because these are designated depositories, which are named by members, and if we are not going to supply them with these publications we ought to provide that they shall not be supplied. The amendment offered by the gentleman applied to the surplus, and this applies to the permanent publication and the distribution to all libraries that are depositories. Mr. COFFEEN. If this section was so worded as to apply only to the public depositories, with the understanding that was given us the other day on this point, that these depositories are subject to constant revision by members of Congress—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They are.
Mr. COFFEEN. Then I have no objection to the distribution to such depositories. But it names more than the public depositories. It speaks of certain public libraries having a cer-positories. It speaks of certain public libraries having a certain number of volumes, and when you travel through the West, in that partially developed country, where our institutions of learning and libraries are not yet fully developed, a great many of them may not have 1,000 volumes other than Government pullications, and so we would not get our share with the older and more developed libraries.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Of which section does the gentleman speak?

Mr. COFFEEN. Of section 72.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have passed that some

Mr. COFFEEN. But I object to passing it until it is amended.
It is section 72, which provides that extra numbers of certain documents shall be distributed by the superintendent of documents shall be and multiplift libraries having more than ments to free schools and public libraries having more than a thousand volumes other than Government publications, which have not been designated as public depositories, and which school and public libraries I wish stricken out unless they are designated by the Congressman. I was just saying, also, if the gentleman will permit me until I finish my statement, that in the West it is impossible at this time to have our public libraries brought up to the condition where they would have the number of 1,000 volumes required by this provision, and they can not reach up to this requirement. I therefore think we ought to adopt an amendment giving to those people and the people of other States a just and equitable quots in every Congressional district, without regard to the condition of their libraries; and I want, therefore, this section to be so amended. I hope the gentleman will amend this section in that respect himself, so as to limit distribution to the designated depositories and without records to the bution to the designated depositories and without regard to the number of volumes in them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. While I am in sympathy with the gentleman, I think his amendment is wholly unneces-This section provides that whenever there is an order of publication of a document in excess of 5,000 that 10 per cent, or 500 copies, shall go to the superintendent of documents for distribution to libraries designated. The 5,000 is intended for Members and Senators. You get your pro rata of them, and it simply provides that 10 per cent, or 500 copies, in excess of the number that would be published otherwise shall go to the superintendent to be distributed to the libraries. It is simply making him the agent to supply the libraries, and does not take the distribution away from members, or if it does, it only takes one copy and guarantees that the libraries shall receive that copy from the superintendent of documents. You get the whole number that is published for distribution in your own way, for the use of members, and this officer simply gets 10 per cent of the number where it is in excess of 5,000 for distribution to these public libraries.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to submit an amendment to section

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have passed that section, and I do not want to return to it.

Mr. PICKLER. But we have returned to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But that was only for de-

We are now considering it for all purposes. Mr. PICKLER. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not like to go back. Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment on just one point, which I do not think the gentleman will object to. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "one thousand," in line 8, of section 72, and insert he words "five hundred."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is 500 volumes. I do not object to that. But my idea is that a library that has only 500 volumes other than Government publications is not much of

Mr. PICKLER. It may be true that it is not much of a library, but as my friend from the West [Mr. Coffeen] has said, in our new States it takes some little time even to get a library of 500 volumes

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. PICKLER. Now, I desire to offer an amendment to section 73, to make it conform to the provision just adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows: Strike out "one thousand," in line 5 of section 73, and insert "five hun-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman how these libraries are to be designated—by the superintendent of documents or by the members of Congress. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. By members of Congress.
Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to section 74. The chairman of the Committee on Printing having this bill in charge admitted the injustice of this section some time ago in the discussion here, and I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add after the word "ordered," at the end of line 8, section 74, the following: "And each Senator. Representative, and Delegate shall be notified in writing once every sixty days of the number and character of the publications on hand and assigned to him for use and distribution."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendmend to section 72.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 7 and 8 of section 72, all after the word "documents" down to and including the word "been," in line 10; so that the provision shall read: "Said copies shall be distributed by the superintendent of documents to designated depositories," etc.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read a portion of section 76, as follows:

SEC. 76. Extra copies of documents and reports shall be printed promptly when the same shall be ready for publication, and shall be bound in paper or cloth as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and shall be of the number following in addition to the usual number:

Of the Agricultural Report, 500,000 copies, of which 110,000 shall be for the Senate, 350,000 for the House, and 30,000 for distribution by the Agricultural

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is a mistake in the printing of the paragraph just read. The number of the Agricultural Report should be 400,000. That is the number that has been printed for many years with a single exception, and it should have been so in the bill, but by accident the number was made 500,000. Iask unanimous consent to change the number to 400,000, the distribution to be made as before.

Mr. BRETZ. The gentleman must remember that there is an increased membership here to be provided for.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This will give us about

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This will give us about 800 copies apiece.
Mr. BRETZ. That is not enough for my district.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, that will be sufficient.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee. The amendment was read, as follows:

Section 76, line 6, strike out "five" and insert "four;" line 7, strike out 10" and insert "70;" line 8, strike out "and sixty thousand."

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The gentleman says that he intended to have the number of the Agricultural Report 400,000 in the bill. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Yet in the report to the House upon this bill the gentleman says:

Agricultural Report. This section authorizes the printing of 500,000, which is 100,000 more than has been printed for many years by joint resolution. The distribution of the 500,000 is proportionately the same as heretofore

That last remark relates to the increase of members. why does the gentleman move to reduce the number to 400,000

why does the gentleman move to reduce the number to 400,000 when he reported in favor of 500,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Four hundred thousand is the number that has usually been printed, the number printed regularly except one year, and I think it is enough.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. But why did the gentleman report in favor of 500,000, and add that in view of the increased number of members, that would make a proportionate distribution such as we have hed beautofore? as we have had heretofore?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That was not the object in view in making that statement. I may not have changed the language of the report made some two years ago when we printed 500,000 copies, but the intention was to have the number 400,000.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. But, if the gentleman will pardon me, this report recognizes the increase of membership and gives that as the reason for the increase to 500,000; the reason being that we would require that number to make the same proportionate distribution that we had formerly with a smaller membership.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not do that exactly.

The words which the gentleman reads were written by me in a report made more than two years ago. This report, I suppose, simply copied that language of a report made when it was contemplated that we would have a change of the members of Congress. The Senate made the increase, not the House. But I do not think the increased number is necessary.

mot think the increased number is necessary.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. May I ask another question? Was this report of the Committee on Printing, which I hold in my hand, adopted on the 12th of September, and ordered to be printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I submitted it at that time.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Without reading it?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no; I wrote it. But I used a portion of printed matter from a former report. It is very easy for the language of a former report to get in in that way.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Was the attention of your colleagues called to the fact that it favored an increase to 500,000?

Tournessee. I can not say about that;

that is immaterial. The question is whether 400,000 copies will be enough. That is all we have been printing; and it seems to me all that we ought to print of this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the section which

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the section which gentlemen are discussing has not yet been read.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I see that this is a very long section. Would it not be better that it be considered and amended by paragraphs?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. By all means.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that it be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that section 76 be read by paragraphs and that amendments be offered to each paragraph as read. In the absence of objection that order each paragraph as read. In the absence of objection that order will be made

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. One word further and I will yield the floor. The publication of the Agricultural Report costs this Government 60 cents per volume for the printing. If we print 400,000 the cost is $240,000; if we print 500,000 the cost will be $300,000. Now, as some of my friends here want 500,000 winted instead of 400,000 Lock tham whather they think it a printed instead of 400,000, I ask them whether they think it a proper and wise expenditure of the public money for us to issue proper and wise expenditure of the public money for us to issue that enlarged number of this publication, at a cost of 60 cents a volume, when within twenty-four hours after these reports come from the Printing Office they can be bought by the thousand at stores in this city for 4, 5, and 6 cents per volume?

Mr. BRETZ. Why is that so?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I say it costs the Government 60 cents a volume to print this document; and within twenty-four hours after it is printed it is worth in the stores only 4 to 6 cents a conv.

only 4 to 6 cents a copy.

Mr. BROWN. Where does the supply come from that enables the dealers to sell these books at that rate?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think my friend from Tennessee is mistaken as to the price at which these books can be bought. I would like to know where they can be purchased at 5 cents a copy

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly my friend does not think I am mistaken as to what it costs the Government to print them?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. No, sir; but I would like to know where they can be purchased at 5 cents a copy. I would like to buy some at that figure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, let the gentleman go to W. H. Lowdermilk's, on F street, and he will furnish the books—I will not undertake to fix the price which he will ask; but it will not exceed IO cents a volume.

but it will not exceed 10 cents a volume.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That may be the fact; but that is double the amount of the figure the gentleman named.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have myself purchased a number of copies of these documents at 10 cents a volume.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You can buy them by the wagonload at that price; and I know that in some cases they have been bought at 4 cents a volume.

Mr. PICKLER. Were those late issues, or volumes several years old?

Mr. WEADOCK. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennes-see whether his committee has ever considered any plan for assigning the Agricultural Reports to members representing agricultural districts?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have not.

Mr. WEADOCK. Of course city members have no need for these documents.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have not considered that matter; we could not do so, because no such proposition has been referred to our committee, therefore we would not have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. TURPIN. In view of what the gentleman from Tennes see has stated in regard to the price at which these books can be bought at the stores, perhaps it would be a good idea to strike out "400,000" and insert "200,000," and then authorize the committee at any time within two days after the publication to buy from the dealers the other 200,000. It does not require very much calculation to make it clear that we would make a good deal of money in that way in a very short time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee was not anticipated in view of the gentleman's own report—by which 500,000 copies are authorized. This the committees unanimously recommend in the Senate and the House in a report which I hold in my hand.

The argument which he alleges against this is an appeal to the committee for a correction of certain abuses of the law, which can not possibly avail with those gentlemen who have not abused it. I have no doubt that a large number of the volumes of which the gentleman has information being sold at a less price than 10 cents per volume, are the quotas of members who represent city districts, or those districts where there are no agriculturists, and which are given by such members to friends for disposition, to the pages perhaps around the House. I was told of an instance where a retiring member, representing a city constituency, gave his whole quota of Agricultural Reports to one of the pages. Of course the page sells them, as he has a perfect right to do. City members have little use for these has a perfect right to do. City members have little use for these books, and very often give them away to their fellow-members or dispose of them in other ways. But the exceptions where they are offered for sale, as the gentleman from Tennessee states, are necessarily very few. There is not a book published in the list of books authorized by Congress that is more acceptable to the same property of the sam ble to the people among whom they are distributed than the present Agricultural Report, and there is no publication which the House would be less justified in dispensing with or curtail-ing. We published 15,000 copies of the ethnological report. costing $15 or $20 a volume, and it is without practical interest or benefit to the farmers of the country. It is of no possible benefit to the majority of them. Why then strike from the number of books that cost 60 cents per volume those to which the farmers of the country are entitled?

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Ten-amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one amendment pending.

Mr. BRETZ. I represent largely an agricultural district, and the pending amendment is one that very materially affects the people of my district. I represent a district containing a voting population of at least 20,000 farmers, or men engaged in agriculture. My friend from Tennessee complains about the cost of these Agricultural Reports, stating that they costabout 60 cents a volume.

I wish to say to him that these reports are about all the farmers of this country, or of my district at least, get from the Government. They are interested in this report. It contains a valuable collection of facts that will enable them to conduct their farming operations on more scientific principles and thereby make more out of their farms than they do now. I have a constant demand for them, and instead of reducing the number as suggested here I would be willing to vote to still further increase the number over and above the 500,000 originally fixed in the bill, because it is the most important document I can send into my district to the farmers.

The farmers in my district, Mr. Chairman, care nothing for books giving the photograph of the skeleton of bugs that lived thousands of years ago and publications of that character. All they care for is that which concerns their own business and present living current information, and, as I said before, this is about all they get out of the Government—that is, these Agricultural Reports—which represent about all they get from the appropriation of the public money. And while it may occur occasionally, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] has observed, that some member of Congress representing a city constituency would have no use for his Agricultural Reports, and stituency would have no use for his Agricultural Reports, and gives them to a page, or disposes of his quota in some other way that is no reason why we who represent agricultural districts, and have constant demand for the books, should be cut down in our quota and prevented from supplying them where they are needed.

I think, sir, that if anything is done in that direction this Joint Committee on Printing should arrange for a different distribution of the documents. Instead of giving to a member representing city constituencies these agricultural works, turn them over to the members who represent agricultural districts, and turn over those that do not concern the farmers to the members representing city constituencies.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to interrupt, I entirely agree with his statement as to how these documents ought to be distributed. There is no sense in giving an Agricultural Report to a gentleman representing a city constituency, where there is nobody engaged in farming, and where the book would be of no value. The gentleman's object, however, can be reached by a simple amendment to the bill, directing the Secretary of Agriculture, or someone else who has charge of it—I believe the bill provides for a public distributor of documents—requiring him to distribute the Agricultural Reports amongst the members represent the secretary of t ports amongst the members representing agricultural districts.

Mr. BRETZ. That is another proposition after we vote down the amendment of our friend from Tennessee.

I do not know what amendment is pending. Mr. OATES. It is to strike out 500,000 Agricultural Reports Mr. BRETZ.

and make it 400,000.

Mr. OATES. If it is fixed at 400,000, and none of the books go to city districts, it will leave a larger proportion to the agricultural districts than they now receive, or nearly as large at all

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire especially to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing a question with reference to these Agricultural Reports. Of course all of us who represent agricultural districts are interested in these reports, They are a great source of interest to our people, and I think we ought to have fully as many volumes as we now have, or that the number ought to be increased.

But what I more especially desire to know is this. Has the committee made any arrangement, or can it make any, by which these Agricultural Reports can be prepared for distribution in less time than it now takes? For instance, the Agricultural Report of 1892 is barely ready for distribution at this time. Is thereany way by which we can have them printed earlier, so that they may be ready for distribution in less than a year's time after the facts are collated by the Department and sent to the Public

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can not answer that question. That depends upon the state of the work in the Government Printing Office, and also upon the preparation of the number of lithographic plates that have to be furnished to the Public Printer, the work upon which is not done here, but by lithographic establishments in other cities.

Mr. SMITH of illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] knows as well as I do that we are called on, six and nine months in advance of the publication of these volumes, to furnish them to our constituents. Is there anything in this bill by which any arrangement is made for the earlier publica-tion of these volumes?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is not. The law now is that the manuscript goes to the Public Printer at the close of the calendar year. When it gets to him, say in the month of December, or the 1st of January, there is a volume of a thousand or twelve hundred pages to be printed, with hundreds and hundreds of plates that have to be prepared, and they have to go to the lithographing establishments in New York or elsewhere, where they are lithographed. It takes the Public Printer a long time to get them back.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Would it be possible for the Committee on Printing to request that these be made special, and if that were done, could the printing be done earlier than it is now done?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If they were made special they could be printed earlier.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will the chairman try to get something of that kind done? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. One word, and then I will be through. I was going to say that I do not want to misrepresent anybody in this statement as to the price of these books; but the joint committee took proof upon this subject, and if generally the way to be supported by the way that the subject is the way to be supported by the way that the subject is the subject in the subject is the subject in the subject is the subject in the subject in the subject is the subject in the subject is the subject in the subject in the subject in the subject is the subject in the subject in the subject in the subject in the subject is the subject in the su tlemen will turn to the report, on page 255, they will find that we called a witness before us who had these Agricultural Reports for sale. He sent out this advertisement:

Fight hundred copies Agricultural Reports of 1891; also 216 copies of that valuable work, Diseases of the Horse. Will sell at low figures.

He sent that advertisement out on a postal card, and we called him before the committee and interrogated him. "Where did you get them?" and he told us.

We asked him at what price he sold them, and he said he sold the report on Diseases of the Horse at from 40 to 50 cents a copy, and the Agricultural Report at an average of 5 cents a volume. That is the ground on which I made the statement that they can be bought for that. But there seems to be such a demand for these publications that I withdraw the amendment and will allow the number to remain at 500,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment. It is at the

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]. The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 10, on page 32, insert the following:
"Provided further, That there shall be published at each session of Congress 40,000 copies of the publication of the Agricultural Department known as the special report on the Diseases of the Horse, 10,000 for the Secretary of Agriculture, 10,000 for the Senate, and 20,000 for the House of Representa-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The point of order is that this bill provides only for permanent publications of the Government. This special report is not a permanent publication, but it is an effort to put in the bill a publication which is simply a special report. This bill, as I have stated, dc..ls with the annual permanent publications of the Government, and not with special reports, and it is not intended to provide for them.

Mr. PICKLER. That is just what I am and averaging to do

Mr. PICKLER. That is just what I am endeavoring to do.
This bill is certainly amendable. The gentleman does not pretend that the bill which he has reported can not be amended.
Now, I simply undertake in this amendment to make this publication, known as the special report on Diseases of the Horse, a permanent annual publication, that a certain number shall be printed at every session of Congress. I think the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in the power of the House, if it so desires, to continue this publication and to make it annual.

Mr. PICKLER. I trust that this amendment will be adopted, and it ought to be twice the number, rather than the 40,000 and if ought to be twice the number, rather than the 40,000 copies that I suggest.

Mr. McMillin. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. McMillin. What is the necessity of making an additional print of this work on the Diseases of the Horse for distribution by the Agricultural Department? That Department has already printed, without any direction by Congress, a very large number of these books, and distributed them long ago. Then Congress added still further to this number, and now you propose to make a third reprint for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. PICKLER. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. I think we have had three different publications of that book; and yet if the gentleman's constituents are at all like mine, he is receiving letters by almost every mail asking for copies of this work; and I want to say to the new members here upon this floor that you are getting these requests, and you have none of that publication to your credit, and will not have any unless this amendment is adopted.

Now, as to the merits of the work. I want to say this, that we have just had a new edition of this book. The plates and stereotypes are prepared and are new. There has simply been one edition stricken from these plates, so that it will be very little cost to the Government outside of the cost of the paper and the binding.

Mr. McMillin. Does not the gentleman know that to day, in the junk shops of this city, these books can be bought for less than they are worth?

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir. Not in any number. You can not get 500 copies to save your soul.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the situation has changed very materially lately

Mr. PICKLER. Farmers are paying $2 or $3 each for them. Mr. File Left. Farmers are paying $2 or $3 each for them. You may occasionally pick up a copy in a bookstore where they will sell them for what they can get; but that is not an answer to the question. Now, gentlemen, talking about the Agricultural Department reports, and nobody wanting them; here is a report that they do want. They are wanted by all classes of men, by farmers, by merchants, and all who are owners of horses; and certainly in all our districts there are a large number of people who do own horses. It is recognized as the most valuable publication that has ever been issued under the direction of the Government.

It does not seem to me that we should not begin to use economy as against agriculturists. If a man has a horse that is sick he desires to know what should be done for it and to do it immediately; and this book saves multiplied thousands of dollars to our people. It is a book that all men who own horses need, and that they shall be able to consult. Let us economize somewhere else. Let us cut down some of the other reports.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there?
Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.
Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman bases his argument on the fact that it is beneficial to the people, would the gentleman insist upon the publication of a medical book and sending it out for free distribution among the people—
Mr. PICKLER. That is not a suppossible case.
Mr. McMILLIN. For men, women, and children.
Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman, I suppose, wants to advocate the abolishment of the Agricultural Department.
Mr. McMILLIN. I advocate the running of the Government on Government lines. I do not question the merits of this book; and this is not the question here. We have already printed a and this is not the question here. We have already printed a large number of them; and if a new edition is to be printed, let it be done in a separate bill, and in this bill, which provides not for the printing of special documents, but provides a general law to govern all printing.

Mr. PICKLER. Let us abolish the Agricultural Department on your theory. If this matter will help the agriculturists and stock-raisers, what is the good of objecting to it? We should be able to go to this expense in their interest. There is no publication, and I say it without any fear of contradiction, so valuable to the farmers and so valuable to every member upon this floor to the farmers and so valuable to every member upon this floor as has been this publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to concede much that the gentleman from South Dakota has said in regard to the value of this publication. It is a valuable work; but, Mr. Chairman, I say that I am utterly opposed to Congress printing any more copies of this work.

Mr. PICKLER. Why?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is what I am going to tell you.

Mr. PICKLER. I know of no good reason.
Several MEMBERS. He will give you them.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Ch

Mr. Chairman, we have already printed 175,000 copies of this work, and if you continue to print and send out this work gratis, you will simply increase the demand for it in each succeeding edition, and you will never satisfy the demand. You can not satisfy the demand for a good thing when you give it away.

Mr. PICKLER. Because it is good, you do not want the people to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We proceed upon a wrong Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We proceed upon a wrong principle when we undertake to supply this demand for this book; and I will tell you how it ought to be supplied. This bill provides for the sale of the plates from which this book is printed. Now, let some deserving poor printer purchase these plates from the Government and print that book in numbers sufficient to meet the demand. It will cost 60 cents a copy to print the book. Now any man who has a horse, much less a horse that is a good one, and who will not spend 60 cents for a book by which he may learn to dector that here a water to the control of the cont which he may learn to doctor that horse ought not to have a horse; but when you come to print 180,000 copies, as you have done, and then add 60,000 more by this amendment—

Mr. PICKLER. Only 40,000. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Making 220,000-

Mr. PICKLER. There ought to be 2,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). For which you have paid 60 cents each, you still see that you have taxed the Government $150,000, and we do that to put that book out; to distribute it among the people gratis, we only create a demand for that many more copies.

Now, it is unjust to give this book to one citizen if you do not give it to another, and as long as you distribute it by this method you can only half meet the demand. The plan I propose is that the plates be sold and let some poor printer earn a living by printing this work and selling it at a reasonable price. In that way the entire demand can be met at a cost of about 60 cents a

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the gentleman what better right has this Government to publish a book to teach me how to doctor my horse than it has to publish a geography to teach children the map of the world? It occurs to me that instead of providing for printing more of these documents all such provisions ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Under the Department of Agriculture we have a large bureau, with seven or eight heads of the different divisions and a chief, costing the Government altogether not less than $50,000 a year. If the Bureau of Animal Industry amounts to anything, why not publish the investigations and discoveries which it makes for the benefit of the people?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am in favor of publishing them, and this bill puts at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture a large sum of money for the purpose of compiling such information, and authorizes him to publish a certain edition. But when the Government, with its special facilities, has got together these statistics and other information, and when these bureaus have discovered something valuable, as it seems they have done in this special report in relation to diseases of the horse, then I think the Government has done all it ought to do. If it has special facilities for procuring this information, let it use those facilities; but it does not follow that it ought to undertake to supply gratis the demand for these publications all over the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to line 10, page 32, the words "Provided, That in the Agricultural Reort for 1863 the special report on Diseases of the Horse shall be printed."

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, that will enable the farmers of this country to have a very large distribution of this very valuable work, and I do not see that it interferes with the scope and purpose of this bill at all. It simply provides that in the Report of the Agricultural Department for 1893 the special report on Diseases of the Horse shall be embodied.

Mr. McMILLIN. Infurther support of my colleague's amendment, I want to call attention to the fact that the proposition of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler], which I have examined, provides for the printing of 40,000 copies of this document at every session of Congress until Gabriel blows his trumpet. If this Government lasts so long, we shall be printing annually 40,000 copies of this book on the Diseases of the Horse. [Laughter.] Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.
Mr. PATTERSON. I simply desire to say that I have consulted with a great many members, and I have not seen one who represents an agricultural district who did not say that he had a very large demand for this book. It seems to me that the printing of it in the Agricultural Report would be a very proper and

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw my amendment and accept the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee. I am really pleased that somewhere in Tennessee there are friends to horsemen. The interior of Tennessee does not seem to have any horses. [Laughter.] I suppose they have mules, and I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that he can find something in this book that will help him to doctor mules as well as

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I recommend it to the gentleman's own constituency. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. Well, my constituents have intelligence enough to want this horse book, while the gentleman's do not seem to have so much intelligence.

Mr. McMILLIN. The intelligence of a constituency is always

Mr. McMILLIN. The intelligence of a constituency is always judged by its action in electing a Representative. [Laughter.]
Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Tennessee says that this amendment of mine provides for a continual annual publication of this document. So it does, and this document ought to be published regularly. These agricultural reports are continuous; the Bureau of Animal Industry is continuous; this book on the horse is superior to any of the other publications, and why should it not be printed and distributed continuously among the people of this country who want it? I want to say further that the arguof this country who want it? I want to say further that the argument that because the people want these books in such large quantities they should not be supplied with them is futile. The demand shows the appreciation by the people of this work, yet demand shows the appreciation by the people of this work, yet now, when we have gone to the expense of printing the book, when we have the stereotype plates on hand, it is proposed to cut off the publication and not let the people have the advantage of it, but to sell the plates to somebody to go into a private speculation. That is the argument. Now that we have the plates of this work on hand, why should we not let the people have the benefit of it by free distribution?

Mr. BRETZ. I desire to observe to my friend from South Dakota that the amendment now rending does not provide for

Dakota that the amendment now pending does not provide for the publication of this document beyond the year 1893. It sim-ply provides that it shall be incorporated in the Agricultural Report for that year, but says nothing about any future publica-

Mr. PICKLER. I appreciate what the gentleman says, but I think that if we get this number this time there will be no controversy over printing this document hereafter; even Tennessee will fall into ranks the next time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] will prevail.
If I am not mistaken the proposition of the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge would result in preventing the free transmission of these books through the mails. While they are a Government publication they can be franked, but otherwise we should not have the right to frank them to our constituents. I think I am correct. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee be adopted, this book will be sent out under the frank of members of Congress without increasing the expense to the Government.

All that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler] says with reference to the demand for this book is true. There says with reference to the demand for this book is true. There is no other Government publication issued during the three terms that I have been in Congress for which I have had so much call as for this. The statement of one gentleman here that this book can be bought at the book stores for 20 cents a volume is a mistake. You can not buy a copy of this book in the city of Washington for less than a dollar, nearly twice the cost of publication by the Government. It seems to me it would be statesmanship and economy to stop the publication of books for which we have no demand, and to sumply to the people what they are we have no demand, and to supply to the people what they are asking for—such books as this, which treats of the diseases of the horse. It is certainly a valuable book.

Mr. EVERETT. I think it very likely that my colleague [Mr.

Morse is correct in what he says as to being unable to buy these volumes at bookstores, except at a large price. But I have had them offered to me by private parties—as many copies as I might wish—for 50 cents a volume.

Mr. MORSE. That is 10 cents less than they cost the Gov. ernment. There is no question that the Government does publish thousands of volumes of books which are comparatively useless; but this is a book pertaining to diseases of that faithful animal, the best servant that God Almighty ever gave man—the horse. Let us disseminate this information, let us adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, I beg to differ with gentlemen who have spoken in regard to the value of this publication. In who have spoken in regard to the value of this publication. In my view there never was a greater humbug in the shape of a book issued by the Government than this very publication. You may read the book from beginning to end and you will find that it does not prescribe a single remedy for any disease of the horse. Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. LANE. Oh, no, I am not. The gentleman has had his talk; and I hope he will not interrupt me. I say that in any bookstore in this city or elsewhere you can buy for 40 cents a better book on the horse and his diseases than this publication which costs the Government more than a dollar a volume to print which costs the Government more than a dollar a volume to print and send out. By propositions of this kind you swell the taxes upon the people, while you deceive them with the idea that you are sending them a free book, when in point of fact, in view of the way our taxes are levied, the book costs the people $4 a

This book on the Diseases of the Horse ought not to be incorporated with our Agricultural Report. If included with that report it must exclude something more valuable, or must make the volume unnecessarily bulky.

It may be wise for the Government to publish occasionally information which the people cannot obtain from ordinary sources, but when such information is published it is the property of the people; and if the information is really valuable to the people, and desired by them, there is enterprise and pluck and capital enough in the country to publish in book form such information. If it will not pay private enterprise to circulate these volumes, the Government ought not to do it.

In matters of this kind the citizen can always do better than the Government; and the Government ought not to be administered in a paternal spirit by furnishing to the people a volume of this kind, when the citizen can for a reasonable price buy at any bookstore a reliable publication on the subject by some of the most scientific horsemen in the country. I say that the idea of circulating books of this kind through the agency of the Gov-ernment is a humbug and a fraud. The amendment ought not

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, it is surprising to me that so many gentlemen should rise here in opposition to the printing of this book. Beyond question there is a general demand for the book among our agricultural community, numbering throughout the United States 30,000,000 people. Yet I notice that whenever any proposition comes up in this House for the interest of the agricultural community there is general opposition to it. Gentlemen here are eloquent in advocay of a bill to appropriate $6,000,000 for building a battle ship, while as a matter of fact we appropriated last year but a little over $3,000,000 for agricultural purposes-for the purpose of carrying on the Agricultural Department of this country.

My objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Ten Agricultural Report, the people will not get it until 1894. This is too long for them to wait. There is now a very urgent demand for the book; and I believe it ought to be printed at once at the expense of the Government and sent out.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman will allow me to say that during this Congress several propositions for printing this volume have been introduced and referred to the Committee on Print-have been introduced and referred to the committee ing; but they slumber and die there.

Mr. SIMPSON. Certainly, simply because the old mossback farmers of the country have been sending here as Representatives men who are intent only on looking after the interests of corporations, so that the agriculturists can not get a hearing. Such things as this ought to be a lesson to them. Of course this lands. Such things as this ought to be a lesson to them. Of course this is comparatively a small matter, but it illustrates how inadequately the agricultural community are represented in this House. When a little matter of this kind meets with such opening the such a position, it is only another straw showing which way the wind is blowing here.

I will guarantee that if any bill came up here appropriating anything in the way of a benefit to a corporation, these gentlemen would not be quite so eloquent in their denunciation of it or so vigorous in their opposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass; and as we have Now, Mr. Chairman, I nope this old will pass; and as we have gone into this particular fraternal business, and the other fellows have got their hands into the public Treasury, I propose that there shall be a fair divide in the interest of the farmers, as long as we are committed to the policy and propose to con-

Here the hammer fell. Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this publication is not so much to provide a remedy for the diseases of the horse as to diagnose the diseases to which the animal is sub-the horse as to diagnose the diseases to which the animal is subject. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lane]—and I presume he has not read the book—

Mr. PICKLER. Of course he has not.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman is vastly mistaken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (continuing). If the gentleman from Illinois will say that it does not point out distinctly and definitely every single disease to which the horse is subjected—

Mr. LANE. I say that the book is of no practical use or assistance to any man in taking care of his horse.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It not only points out the diseases and

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It not only points out the diseases and the mode of detecting them when the horse is affected by dis-

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact and the truth of the matter is, that the farmers of this country and the laborers, tenants, and croppers of the country handle millions and millions of dollars worth of horseflesh and muleflesh annually, and many of them, the great bulk in fact, are absolutely ignorant of the diseases of the freat bulk in fact, are absolutely ignorant of the diseases of the horse, and are ignorant of the remedy to apply when the disease is ascertained. There is an almost universal demand for this book. I want to suggest that the agricultural people of the country are not the only people who demand this book. Stable men, merchants, fancy stock-raisers, ratired citizens, gold bugs, and silver men, everybody is demanding the book. I do not want to charge in this House that this is an appropriation especially and since the target of the country. Untropose it cially and simply for the farmers of the country. But suppose it was? Taxation in its last analysis means the sweat of the face; and when the members of the House wish to publish the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, where but a single argu-ment was made directly opposed to the interests of the farmers of the country, there was but little objection to publishing thousands and thousands of them at a vast expense to the people.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indians. Oh, yes; there was objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the Revised Statutes, or the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, was before the House to-day for publication, and the chairman of the committee having the publication, and the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge should ask us to provide 100,000 additional Supplements for the benefit of the lawyers of the country, there would be no objection. Why, then, the objection whenever the farmers or laborers are interested? Why, I ask?

Mr. Chairman, it makes me tired when men stand here contending for appropriations by the millions to foster and support monopolies, and yet when the farmer asks for a little amount here, why he is ridiculed on the floor of the House by some such speech as that of the gentleman from Illinois, who says he does not understand what he wants, and that he is simply deceived and humburged by somebody else. humbugged by somebody else.

Mr. LANE. I represent more farmers than you do or ever will.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, I will make this suggestion to the gentleman, that if one-fourth of his farmers indorse the statement he made here to-day, I will resign my seat in this House. Now the only objection I have heard to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is this, that we are too long getting the edition published of the Agricultural Report. I am willing, however, to accept it, and since the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] has accepted the amendment I will give it my support. my support.
Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Georgia pardon me for a suggestion?

Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me that if we are to publish more copies of this book on the Diseases of the Horse, it should be in a separate volume, and not be put in the Agricultural Report, which is already quite bulky. It will make the book so much a separate volume, and not be put in the Agricultural Report, which is already quite bulky. It will make the book so much larger than now, that it will be quite inconvenient to those people who have occasion to use it. I suggest, therefore, that if we are to publish more volumes they should be separate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I quite agree with my friend from Maine. Mr. DINGLEY. And since little or nothing will be saved by publishing the two together, there seems every reason why these publications should be separate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired has expired.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York was recognized.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for an

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Certainly. Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to add these words to the amend-tent: "as a separate volume."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would not do that. That is more than even the gentleman from South Dakota asked for.
Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a ques-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor and yielded, as the Chair understands, to the gentleman from Tennessee only for a suggestion.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the gentleman will yield me a few moments further.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. With the consent of the committee I will do so.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to say this, Mr. Chairman, that on reflection it might make the Agricultural Report too volu-minous to combine the two; therefore I think it would be better to print the book in two volumes, and thus let this special re-port on the Diseases of the Horse appear in a separate volume.

port on the Diseases of the Horse appear in a separate volume. I desire to say that while I am not very conversant with these matters, I represent a district that has four agricultural counties in it. I have distributed every copy of this book that I could get, and I have now over a hundred letters lying on my table from farmers requesting this book, and I am unable to supply the demand. I think, in all seriousness, that the test of the merit of a book is the demand which comes from the people who use it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is true.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, when the first edition of this book was published it went out to thousands, and increasing demands have come up from the farmers throughout the country for this work. I think the cheapest and most expeditious manner in work. I think the cheapest and most expeditious manner in which to publish this book is to do so in connection with the next Agricultural Report as a separate volume.

Mr. SIMPSON. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Pat-

Mr. SIMPSON. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PatTERSON] will allow me—
Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I can not yield further.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN
VOORHIS] is entitled to the floor.
Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I want to say a word in favor of this book. It is unquestionably a very valuable publication. It ought to be in the hands of every farmer and of every man who handles horses in any shape. I do not care in what form you print it, whether you put it in the Agricultural Report or print it in an independent volume, or make an additional volume to the Agricultural Report. It ought to be printed in some way.

I want to say with reference to this book that a prominent citizen of my district, who owned a very valuable horse that was diseased, and in the hands of veterinary surgeons, who could not do him any good, wrote me for the book. I managed to get one, and I have a letter from him stating that he is doctoring the horse himself under the directions of the book, and that the horse is getting well.

Now, this book makes every horse-owner his own horse-doctor, If we are going to print books at all, when there is a book that is really valuable let us give it to the people.

Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. RICH-

Now, I want to ask the charman of the committee [Mr. RICH-ARDSON of Tennessee] where he is going to find the poor printer to sell these plates to who can pay a price anywhere nearly adequate to what these plates ought to bring? If the printer is a poor printer, you have got to give him the plates, and give away the property of the Government that has cost so much, to some private concern, when the people ought to have the books printed from these plates. from those plates.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope we may get a vote on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agreed to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY].

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the Democratic party had "reform" emblazoned on its banners in the last campaign, as usual

Mr. DINGLEY. On its banners, but nowhere else.
Mr. SIBLEY. I am heartily in favor of reform and in sympathy with it, but I am not one of these reformers who want to commence along the line of the agricultural interests and have reform end at its initial point. I think there are grand opportunities for reform.

The time of this body has been wasted for several days in a proposition to remit the penalty of $40,000 incurred by some shipbuilders. Now, would it not be a pretty good plan of reform to demand that these penalties to which these people have subjected themselves under failure of plain terms of a contract be enforced. Let us take that $40,000 and devote it to some useful purpose. We have paid these firms hundreds of thousands of ful purpose.

dollars as bounties and rewards for doing better than contract, when they carned premiums. Now, let us put the shoe on Uncle Sam's foot for a little while. Let Uncle Sam have a little turkey talked to him when his turn comes, as it so seldom does. But every time a proposition comes in relating to agriculture, somebody suggests cutting down and paring down, and yet the agricultural interests represent 44 per cent of the entire population of this nation, and are the source of our wealth. The agricultural interests of the country are bringing back the gold from Europe to-day and destroying a manufactured panic. While this horse book may be imperfect, as my friend says, yet as a horseman and a person somewhat familiar with anatomy and materia medica, I believe it is a valuable work, and I believe it has saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to the stock-growers of this country. The wider dissemination of information that we can get to the agricultural class who create our wealth the better. I am in favor of reform, but not of cheese-paring reforms. I do not want a reform that stops the spigot, but turns the barrel bung side down and bunghole wide open! I am in favor of reform, but not of cheese-paring re-

I belong to a committee which I am not going to belong to any longer, and I will now resign my position on the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. [Laughter.] That is a committee that ought to be one of the most important committees in this House. It is charged with investigating the expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars. That committee is denied a clerk, and I will never stultify myself by signing a report certifying to the correctness of these carenditures when report certifying to the correctness of those expenditures when I can not tell any more about them than I can tell the contents of this book by looking through the cover. If that committee is afforded ample opportunity to discharge its duty, I will go through those expenditures and devote my time and what little business talent I have to find where that money has gone and see whether it has been properly expended.

I would commence reforms along those lines where there are $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 involved, but would not adopt that character of reform which denies clerk hire amounting to $2,500 a year and call that reform. It is not reform that is known as Democratic reform among my people. I propose to help stop what has been charged here regarding the influence given for a public building in a certain town if influence will be given for another measure in some other place, a trading of jobs as it were. I am not for the kind of reform that would deny to the producers of wealth of this country the information that is given to them by the various reports that are printed.

Give them all the reports they desire. Give them reports on science and chemistry, on plant growth and on anatomy, or materia medica in its relation to domesticated animals, and practically everything that is of interest to them. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, they are the foundation upon which this Republic rests, and the history of the globe shows that whenever agriculture has declined, as it is declining in this country, all material prosperity has declined with it and human liberties have been overthrown. The prosperity of the farmer means at all times the prosperity of the nation, and my voice and my vote will be found favoring any and all legislation having that end in view

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]
Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this body but a short while, but I wish to say that I am very sick and tired of what—not having a better term of expression, and with-out any disrespect—I desire to term by the name of "rot" that has been indulged in on this occasion and on great many other occasions.

I maintain that the farming class, above all people on earth, are interested in the entire destruction of class legislation. I maintain, further, that they can not consistently come to this body and ask for the abolition of class legislation if they seek it for themselves. I say that the farming class, and those that are their friends, should stand up in this House and say the back of our hands is turned against all class legislation of any kind or character.

That is the only ground we can work on, because it is the broad ground of justice and right; and no man in this body can utter a truth of greater importance to the class of people with which I have cast my lot. I am not a town farmer. I have the credit, or discredit, as you may call it, of living 18 miles from the nearest town and railroad. I say that the agriculturists have no respect for a reform of this kind. We do not ask for class legislation of this character, but all we do ask is a free field and fair fight in the battle of life. field and fair fight in the battle of life.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Will you inform me if you are in favor of abolishing the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. And of Education? Mr. LIVINGSTON. And of Education; as being for the benefit of the farmer

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I am not speaking at this time on the question of the abolition of the Agricultural Department. I am protesting in the name of a farming class against what I termed in the beginning "rot," gotten off by political farmers. Laughter

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman now define what he means by class legislation, and what part of this legislation does he call class legislation?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I think that legislation of any kind

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I think that legislation of any kind that gives to any particular class their seeds or their books of any kind or character which they could go into the market and buy is class legislation as far as this bill is concerned; and I do not propose to go any further just now.

Mr. SiMPSON. On that line of argument would the gentleman abolish the printing of the Nautical Almanac, which is a publication of the same kind, so far as the Government is concerned, so useful to another class of citizens engaged in another branch of industry? Would be call that class legislation?

Mr. HALLof Missouri. I will say this to my friend from Kansas, that I am not now discussing the Nautical Almanac; I am simply replying to this stuff that has been gotten off here, placing the farmer in the attitude of asking this Government for class legislation in his behalf. legislation in his behalf.

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman will define what he stuff.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. And I will say further that it is just

Mr. SIMPSON. As what?

Mr. HALLof Missouri (continuing). That it is just such teaching as that which makes the agriculturists of Kansas and other States socialists, or tending in that direction; the teaching which directs them to look to the National Government for suc cess instead of to their own well-directed efforts. I do not believe in any such education as that. I believe that, as old Sam Tilden said, the National Government should do nothing for the State that the State can do for itself; and that neither the Na-tional Government nor the State government should do anything for the individual that he can do for himself; and I want to put myself on record as against all species of class legislation, for the farmer, the manufacturer, or any other class of citizens. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman, before he takes his seat, will define what he meant by "stuff." [Laughter.]
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee was recognized.
Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not know any—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has the

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hall] has just submitted to the House; but I desire at the outset of the few words I shall say to dispute his statement that this is class legislation. It is not class legislation. It is legis-lation clearly within the power of Congress, for the benefit of the whole country, and not for the benefit of any set or class. This book is not to be provided for the agricultural people of the country any more than for the professional or any other class of people; and, in proportion to their numbers, it is used quite a larged by the professional and other people as it is by the agricultural to the professional country by the professional and other people as it is by the agricultural people as it is by the agricultural people as it.

as largely by professional and other people as it is by the agricultural population.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose more particularly to oppose the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON]. If I understand his proposition, it provides for the publication of 500,000 copies of this work, either to be bound with publication of 500,000 copies of this work, either to be bound with the Agricultural Report or separately.

Mr. PATTERSON. In a separate volume.

Mr. BROWN. I do not believe there is anyone upon the floor of this House who sincerely desires that we shall provide for the publication of 500,000 copies of this work, unless it be my friend from Tennessee himself. My earnest and enthusiastic friend from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]—he is an Indiana production, and for that reason I like him, if for no other—asks for only 40,000 copies. I think myself that there ought to be from fifty to seventy-five thousand copies of that work provided for in this bill.

I think so, for the reason that, so far as my experience goes.

I think so, for the reason that, so far as my experience goes, the demand for agricultural literature is continually on the increase. We have already distributed all of these books that were assigned to us, and we can all speak truthfully when we say that we are constantly receiving inquiries about this work. I speak now for no particular class. Men who have livery stables, physicians, and others write for the book; merchants and gentlemen of leisure write for it. It is within the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject, to make this publication for the general welfare of the people, and I trust the House will provide from 50,000 to 75,000 copies of this work.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much that we shall now get along with the bill. say a word or two on this point, but if any other gentleman de-say a word or two on this point, but if any other gentleman desires to speak I will not take the floor from him.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. When this bill was under debate a few days ago section 53 was adopted, providing for the sale of stereotype and electrotype plates of all documents published by the Consequent. I understand the gentleman to say that if this I understand the gentleman to say that if this Government. Government. I understand this gentleman to say that it this document on Diseases of the Horse is desired by the people of this country, the plates can be sold and the publication be made by some private publishing house. I understand that this volume now costs the Government about 50 cents percopy. Now, can the chairman of the committee give us any assurance as to what price per volume the people of this country will have to pay if it ceases to be a Government publication and passes into the hands of private publishers?

I showed to the committee and the House a few weeks ago that the publication entitled Military Tactics, which was copyrighted by Hugh T. Reed, of Chicago, and which could be purchased at first for 40 cents a volume, costs at this time $1.50, as sold by Mr. Reed on the market. If this be true, I take it that if the volume now under consideration should be published by private publishing houses the people will pay twice or three times what it now costs the Government to publish it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There need be no difficulty about this matter. If one person undertakes to issue the publication at too high a figure somebody else will get duplicate plates from the Printing Office, and if two publishers combine in a trust, so that the book is sold too high, then a third, a fourth, and a fifth will be induced to publish the work, so that there is no danger of the price going beyond what the book is worth.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Have we any assurance as to the number of publishing houses that will go into the enterprise of furnishing this publication?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no; but if there is any demand for it some printer can earn a living by printing the book. But that is not the question now before us. The section with which that question connects itself has been passed. I wish to address myself to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. PAT-TERSON), and then I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. Patterson rose. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to my colleague

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire for a moment to reply to my friend from Missouri [Mr. HALL].
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I thought you wanted to

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I thought you wanted to ask me a question. [Laughter.]
Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think my friend from Missouri could go further than I would go in opposition to class legislation; but the House will remember that not ten minutes before I offered this amendment this Committee of the Whole had agreed to print 500,000 copies of the Agricultural Report. Now, that is to all intents and purposes as much class legislation as the publication of the green's property or the Discourse of the House the publication of the special report on the Diseases of the Horse.

Mr. PICKLER. Far more.
Mr. PATTERSON. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the argument of my friend from Missouri falls entirely to the

I wish now to repeat that—— Mr. COOPER of Indiana. On that point will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. There is a distinction which I wish gentlemen of the House to observe, because I do not desire to be put, and I do not think other members of the House ought to be put, in the position of voting for class legislation when they provide for the publication of these Agricultural Reports. These reports are annual publications, and they are supposed to embody each year the results of the experiments conducted in the Agricultural Department; they are the annual reports of the proceedings of that Department. On the other hand, the publication of this work on the Diseases of the Horse is the indefinite reproduction of a book which has been issued to the people heretofore and is now within their reach.

Mr. PATTERSON. In other words, according to my friend from Indiana [Mr. COOPER], if Congress annually indulges in class legislation it is all right; but if it does it in a special instance it is all wrong. I do not understand that argument.

Now, the fact about the matter is, that of all the books that have been published in recent years by the Agricultural Department, this book, so far as my observation extends, is in greatest demand among the agriculturists of this country. am constantly in receipt of letters requesting copies of this ook. If it should be published as a separate volume of the next Agricultural Report I would get only about 800 or 900 copies for my entire district, which, I submit, would be a very limited sup-ply, in view of the fact that the book is so valuable. I submit that this book can be more economically published in connection with the annual Agricultural Report of 1893 than in any other way.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it be published as a separate volume, how can it be sent out any more cheaply when you ouple it with the Agricultural Report?

Mr. PATTERSON. Is this the first instance in which the Agricultural Report has ever been published in two volumes?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is. That report has always been published in one volume.

Mr. PATTERSON. My recollection is that it has appeared heretofore in more than one volume.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Never.
Mr. PATTERSON. Well, I may be mistaken about that. So far as the provision for a separate volume is concerned, I have put that in at the suggestion of friends here, because it would be more convenient and useful in that shape; it could be preserved as a volume by itself; I think the public at large would prefer it in that form; and if it be published in connection with the Agricultural Report it certainly would not involve a very extraordinary expense. I submit that it could be published more cheaply this way than as a separate and independent volume.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I must be

mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I must be permitted a word or two in answer to my colleague [Mr. Patterson]. The estimate for printing this book is 61 cents a copy. If you print 500,000 copies (and that is the number proposed by this amendment) you tax the people over $300,000 for the printing of this one volume on the Diseases of the Horse. Now, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler], who is extravagant [I say it with all respect] in his love for this book, has asked only for the publication of 40.000 copies.

the publication of 40,000 copies.

Mr. PICKLER. Right there will you allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not now. Those 40,000 copies, at 60 cents each, would cost $24,000. I was resisting that proposition; but here comes my colleague [Mr. PATTERSON] and proposes to incur an expense of $300,000 for the printing of this book. It seems to me he does not think what he is doing. It will cost just as much to print this book as a separate volume to will cost just as much to print this book as a separate volume to accompany the Agricultural Report as it would to print it in ordinary form as a volume by itself.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will remind my colleague that the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota proposed an annual publication of 40,000 copies. My amendment proposes a single publication in connection with the Agricultural Report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not want to claim any wall for the ways that the statement of the second s

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not want to claim any credit for the suggestion; but if my colleague would modify his amendment so as to provide for including this publication as a part of the regular Agricultural Report, it might not be so objectionable. But when he undertakes to provide for publishing two volumes—the Agricultural Report of full size to the number of 500,000 copies, and then the same number of copies of this book on the Diseases of the Horse-it seems to me he is going altogether too far.

I think we ought to limit it to one volume, and that ought not to larger than the usual report of the Secretary of Agrilture. We do not want to spend all of the money for the public printing, and the gentleman ought to move his amendment with some consideration of that fact.

Now, let me reply to another remark of the gentleman from South Dakota wherein he says that this book ought to be printed south Dakot wherein he says that this book ought to be printed as an annual report, because there are other annual reports. I wish to say that the regular annual reports are new here; that is to say, they contain new matter every year. But the gentleman's proposition would involve the publication of the same matman's proposition would involve the publication of the same matter year after year. That would be something entirely new and novel in the history of the Government publications. We do print the annual reports each year, as I have said, but they are new material each year. They are supposed to contain new matter. But this publication which the gentleman provides for is a publication every year of the same identical matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.
Mr. PATTERSON. You are versed in these matters. What would be the cost of the printing of the special report as a part of the one volume of Agricultural Reports?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. My opinion is, Mr. Chairman, if you would insert the matter that goes into the special report in the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture, and have it understood at the same time that the regular annual report will be thereby enlarged but little, by leaving something out, it will not add much to the cost of the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture. But if you make a separate volume, then we pay just as much for the special report on the Diseases of the Horse as we pay now for the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture; that is to say, about 60 cents a volume, and the edition of 500,000 copies of the special report which is provided for would entail an expense, as I have already shown, of about $300,000.

Mr. PATTERSON. But my colleague has not quite answered y question. I understand the point that he is discussing now. question. But it is not my object to eliminate matter from the Agricultural Report. My object is not to reduce the Agricultural Report, but to extend the report, by including also the special work on the Diseases of the Horse.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If that goes in the other ought to be reduced.

Mr. PATTERSON. What I want to know is as to the difference in cost between the printing of the special report in one volume and the printing in two volumes—separate volumes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tendessee. There would be a great deal of difference. I can not tell you exactly without an estimate from the Printing Office, but certainly the binding of 500,000 copies would add a very considerable expense

Mr. PATTERSON. Would not that be substantially all the

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That would be the main

Mr. PATTERSON. Now what is the cost of binding such a work as that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not give the exact figures. I suppose anywhere from 25 to 40 cents.
Mr. PATTERSON. For binding alone?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; that is my judg-

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY, Mr. Chairman, it is very evident from the liscussion which has been proceeding in the committee that there is a disposition on the part of the members to vote for the publication of additional copies of the work known as Diseases of the Horse. Whether it is wise to do it or not I do not propose to discuss, because I think the House or the committee—a large majority of it—are in favor of the publication.

Now, the question, and the practical question, it seems to me, s, first, how we shall publish the work under consideration; and, second, how many volumes ought to be published? First, on the point of the manner of publishing. I think it would be exceedingly unsatisfactory if additional copies of the work known as Diseases of the Horse are to be published to include them in the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture. And why? Because if it is to be included in this report it will, in the first place, make an exceedingly bulky volume, that will be handled with a great deal of difficulty. Secondly, if the book is distributed it will necessitate the sending of an Agricultural Report to every person to whom the work on the Diseases of the Horse is sent-two reports to one person-and will, therefore, result in distributing to about one-half of the number of persons that the work should be distributed to if published separate from each other. Third, there would be—and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to this fact—a very little difference in the cost of publishing the works separately and publishing them together, unless the regular annual report on agriculture is to be reduced in size in consequence of this combination of the two books in one. If the regular matter provided for in the annual report on agriculture is to be all included, it will make a volume as bulky as it ought to be without including in it the other volume on the Diseases of the Horse.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interput him for a suggestion?

rupt him for a suggestion? Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand on consultation with friends that the next Agricultural Report will be probably a much smaller volume than usual, and that this special report on the Diseases of the Horse can be incorporated in it without making the volume too bulky. In view of that fact, Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw from the amendment the words "as a separate volume," and let it go as originally prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, just one word, to conclude. Of course, if this volume is to be greatly reduced in bulk, then that particular objection might be obviated, although it would not obviate the first objection to which I have referred; but I assume that this report, when the matter shall be entirely completed for it, will be of the usual bulk; and if so, then that it will make a it, will be of the usual bunk; and it so, then that it will make a book that is altogether too large for usual distribution.

Now, the only possible saving that there can be in putting these volumes in one is not in the entire binding, because each book has to be bound up to the cover precisely the same, whether published together or published separately, and it is simply in the outside cover that any saving will be made, which is not a large amount. large amount.

It seems to me that the advantage that will be had in having these books to distribute separately, thus providing a distribu-tion to twice the number of people without involving the sending of two books bound in one, where only one was wanted, would accomplish greater good.

Thirdly, as to the number of volumes, I do not think it is wise for this House to order the printing of 400,000 copies at this time of this work on the Diseases of the Horse. It seems to me that it is a larger number than is needed at this time. This book is stereotyped, and if future Congresses shall desire additional volumes they can be ordered then; but for the present it seems to me that 75,000, or 100,000 copies at the outside ought to suffice this Congress, and that we ought not, especially in the condition of the Treasury at the present time, to authorize the publication of a large way here of releases the condition of the condition of the treasury at the present time, to authorize the publication of so large a number of volumes at such an expense. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "provided" and insert the matter which I have sent to the Clerk's

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Maine offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Clork read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided" and insert "that 75,000 copies of the Government work known as Diseases of the Horse be printed, 50,000 cop-ies for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate."

Mr. DINGLEY. I would not object to carrying it up to a

Mr. DINGLEY. I would not object to carrying it up to a hundred thousand, if it was very much desired.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to say that I am not so particular about the form in which this publication is obtained, so that we obtain it in some form for our constituents; and I want to say, in reply to the chairman of the committee, that you must remember the chairman of the committee, who is certainly a very efficient member in this House, is here for the purpose of keeping down the appropriations for printing. That is his legitimate business, and he wishes, of course, to make as large a saving as possible, if this bill shall be adopted by the House; so we must expect that he will try to trim these appropriations down all he possibly can.

Now, the gentleman says that this book will be put out every year, and that is not like the Agricultural Report, because that is a new work every year. I want to ask the gentleman if there are not studies and investigations being made by the Agricultural Department every year in regard to the diseases of the horse and all that pertains to the horse, just the same as in all the other departments of agriculture; and if it was an annual publication, would not there be enough new matter in that respect, the same as in any other agricultural report? Further, gentlemen, if one of my constituents gets one of these horse books this year he will not get it next year, but some other constituent will; and is it not a new matter to my other constituent next year, just the same as it is to the one who receives it this year? These books are not duplicated. You do not send them to the same man, as you do the Agricultural Report, but even if it runs for ten years, you would not supply all your constituents. The book is new to each man who receives it every year.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lane] is the only witness that I have ever heard testify on the other side of this case. I have offered a good many resolutions in this House for the publication of this book, and I have received a large number of letters in regard to it from horsemen and menengaged in business where horses are employed; from veterinary surgeons, from many other people, and I have only had the highest commendations of this book.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there can be no other reasonable posi-on. Does not this Government employ the very best talent possible to make this study and to develop the matter that goes into this book? Is it possible that the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to tell us that not only are the people all fools, and do not know what they want when they call for this book, but that the Agricultural Department has employed a lot of nincompoops to get up this book!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a sub-

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That there shall be published 30,000 copies of the publication of the Agricultural Department known as special report on Diseases of the OF86, 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 25,000 for the use of the House of Horse, 5,000 in Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words to the committee. The appropriations for printing, without the extra session, amount to about $3,000,000 per annum. That is what it has cost the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Three million six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SAYERS. Three million six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is what it was last

Mr. SAYERS. Now, that is the expenditure without the additional cost of printing incident to the extra session of Congress.

After this extra session of Congress shall have concluded, the cost of printing will for the present fiscal year be nearly $4,000. cost of brinking will for the present useal year be nearly $4,000,-000. When the deficiency bill comes up for consideration, in order to supply the money necessary for the Printing Office, it will be found that a deficiency appropriation amounting to nearly a million dellars will be required.

I want to caution gentlemen against making these large expenditures. When the sum total of our expenditures for this year shall be reached, and shall amount to over $500,000,000, gentlemen will think it very strange that the Committee on Appropriations, and the other committees which have charge of appropriation bills, have not cut down and trimmed their bills in order that the appropriations of this year should not reach $500,000,000, not thinking that by amendments offered in this House, and passed by this House, the appropriations for printing for the present fiscal year will be more than half a million dollars in excess of those of any previous year.

Now, I warn gentlemen right here, and especially do I warn the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], as to the extent of your appropriation for the present fiscal year.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will my friend just for a moment yield to a suggestion there?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

to a suggestion there?
Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.
Mr. PATTERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman—
Mr. SAYERS. I do not yield for a speech.
Mr. PATTERSON. I will reply to the gentleman—
Mr. PICKLER. The chairman of the Committee on Printing suggests that this bill will save a great deal of money.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But if you get in an order for 300,000 copies of this report there will not be much reduc-

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that the proposition is to print this special report on the Diseases of the Horse in the Agricultural Report. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture can, as I am informed, eliminate matter that is nothing like so valuable to the farmers as this special report; and it seems to me that other matter might be eliminated in such a manner that there would be no material addition to the cost of printing the Agricultural Report in that form to the ordinary cost of printing the Agricultural Report. of printing the Agricultural Report. You have already authorized the printing of 500,000 copies of the Agricultural Report.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, will the gentleman from Tennessee add a clause to his amendment directing the Secretary of Agriculture to eliminate from the Agricultural Report, of which 500,000 copies have been ordered by the House, a sufficient quantity of matter so as to include in its place a reprint of this horse book without additional cost to the Government? If he will do that, I have no objection to the proposition; but what I do want is I have no objection to the proposition; but what I do want is to call the attention of this House, both sides of this House, to the fact that the revenues accruing to the Treasury are steadily declining, and that it is the duty of every member of this House, without regard to party, to bring the appropriations clearly within the revenue. I trust the House will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment Mr. LIVINGSTON. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I want to say to the Committee of the Whole House that my proposition is an economical one. I want to say, in addition to that, it tion is an economical one. I want to say, in addition to that, it provides for 30,000 copies, 25,000 copies for the use of the House and 5,000 for the use of the Senate. In the mean time, when the next Congress assembles, if they want 30,000 copies let them attend to that for themselves. I propose to provide for this Congress, and for this Congress alone. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want the book bound as a separate volume or not at all. If you mix it up with the Agricultural Report you will have to send the Agricultural Report to every man who wants a horse book, and vice versu. It will be more expensive the sentlement of the congress that the sentlement has a force the sentlement of the congress that the sentlement of the congress that the congress that the congress that the congress the sentlement of the congress that the congre pensive, as the gentleman has said, by a great deal than this proposition of mine; and now I ask the committee to accept my amendment, ordering the printing of 30,000 copies, which can be done at a cost of 60 cents a copy, making altogether $18,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], after which the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Maine, will be read, and then the substitute, offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 10, page 32, the words: "Provided, That in the Agricultural Report for 1893, the special report on the Diseases of the Horse shall be printed."

The CHAIRMAN. That is the original proposition, offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "Provided," and insert "That 75,000 copies of the Government work known as Diseases of the Horse be printed; 50,000 copies for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in order to test the judgment of the House as to the smaller number, 30,000, I move to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "thirty." Let the vote be taken on that, and if it be rejected, the vote can then recur on the

The substitute was read, as above.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

The question being taken on Mr. DINGLEY'S amendment, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let there be a division. The House divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].
Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. PICKLER. I understood that the gentleman from Maine Mr. DINGLEY | first offered an amendment providing 50,000 copies for the House and 25,000 copies for the Senate, 75,000 in all, and then moved to amend that, and that we voted on his amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine modified his amendment so as to make the number 30,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. I moved to amend the amendment and that has been voted down; which leaves my amendment now standing proposing to print 75,000 copies.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand it, because the amendment would not have been in order in that degree. The Chair understood the gentleman to modify his amend-

Mr. DINGLEY. It was only an amendment in the second degree. I moved an amendment to an amendment, and an amendment to that was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The first proposition was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], and the gentleman's amendment was an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. DINGLEY. But that proposition was accepted and made the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] to accept it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, if that is not so, of course I am wrong;

but practically it makes no difference.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amend-ment, the same as that offered by the gentleman from Maine, and to have it pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

That 75,000 copies of the Government work known as Diseases of the Horse be printed; 50,000 for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to state

Mr. PICELER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to state the parliamentary situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Patterson]. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler] now offers an amendment to that amendment, which has just been reported by the Clerk. A substitute for both is pending, offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Livingston].

Mr. SPRINGER. Let that be read and voted upon.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, and that is first in order.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I rise to a parliamentary Inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is the original proposition which is pending the amendment of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON]?
The CHAIRMAN. It is.

The CHAIRMAN.

CHAIRMAN. It does. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How is an amendment which calls for 75,000 copies consistent with that unless the proposition is to strike out 500,000 and insert 75,000?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Chair has not so stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error if he did not so state, because that is the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does that carry with it only 75,000 copies of the Agricultural Report?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not relate to the Agree Report at all. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows: It does not relate to the Agricultural Strike out all after the word "provided" and insert the following: "That 75,000 copies of the Government work known as Diseases of the Horse be printed: 50,000 copies for the use of the House and 25,000 copies for the use of the Sonate.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 13, noes 11; so the amendment of Mr. PickLer was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order now to move to amend so as to change the ratio between the Senate and the House? The proportion for the Senate, as the proposition now stands, is too large.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is the ordinary proportion, which has been established from time immemorial. It can not be changed with out making trouble.

Mr. MORSE. I think it can.
The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the amendment would be a reconsideration of action already taken by the Committee of the Whole, and would not be in order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to withdraw my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute being withdrawn, the question is on the original proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson], as amended on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be read as it now stands.

The Clerk read as ollows:

Add after line 10, page 22, these words: "Provided, That 75,000 copies of the Government work known as Diseases of the Horse be printed; 56,000 copies for the use of the House and 25,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If it be in order, I would like to move to amend by striking out 50,000 copies as the proportion for the House and inseating 60,000 and by striking out 25,000 as the House, and inserting 60,000, and by striking out 25,000 as the proportion for the Senate, and inserting 15,000. The CHAIRMAN. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Morse], a few moments ago, the Chair stated that such an amendment would not be in order, as it would involve a reconsideration of the action of the Committee of the Whole. But the Chair now finds that he misunder-stood the parliamentary situation, and that the amendment is in

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I move the amendment as I have just stated it.

Mr. MORSE. That is the amendment which I was about to

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, without objection, will be considered as having been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE]. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "50" and insert "60;" so as to read, "60,000;" and strike out "25" and insert "15," so as to read "15,000;" making the clause read: "Sixty thousand copies for the use of the House and 15,000 copies for the use of the Senate."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, is debate in order?
The CHAIRMAN. It is,
Mr. MORSE. I will occupy just a minute. Every man on this floor knows that members of the House of Representatives have very many more calls upom them than members of the Senate for these documents, notwithstanding the fact that Representatives are so much more numerous. I submit that the amend, ment I have proposed contemplates a just division of these books and ought to prevail.

Mr. DINGLEY. While it might be desirable, if we were reviewing this whole question of the division of Government publications between the two Houses, to endeavor to bring about a modification, we must bear in mind that this is the proportion that we have adopted as a basis of division between the two Houses all through this bill; and it has been adopted with re. spect to all our Government publications. There is some danger that if we should undertake to disturb the existing rule of division we might lose this whole proposition. I think we had better maintain the division which has heretofore prevailed with out any attempt to change it at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would not say a word on this amendment except for the reference of the gentleman from Maine to the division made in this bill. We have simply fol-

Make to the division made in this thit. We have simply lot-lowed the division which has existed for many, many years. Mr. DINGLEY. That is true. Mr. MORSE. But it is unjust, nevertheless. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no idea that the Senate will depart from the division which has prevailed heretofore; but I do not oppose the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the original proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as amended on motion of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr.

Mr. WEADOCK. I move the amendment which I send to the

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 10, raragraph 2, section 76, add the following words:

"Copies of said Agricultural Report shall be apportioned among Representatives according to the number and population of agricultural counties in their respective districts, provided that at least 50 copies be allowed to each Representative."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make the point of order that we have already settled this distribution by a positive vote, and that it is not in order now to change the division as already agreed on.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

the gentleman insists on it.

The Clerk (continuing the reading) read as follows:

Of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, 8,000 copies: 1,000 for the Sente, 2,000 for the House, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are proceeding with undue haste. The suggestion which was made to us by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS] was, it seems to me, very timely, and one which ought to attract the attention and command the consideration of this committee. We are taking action here now which will come back to us hereafter when we are called upon to make appropriations. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether it is not a fact that we have now mittee on Printing whether it is not a fact that we have now stored somewhere in this building, or perhaps in other buildings, a large number of the documents mentioned in this bill, or such documents as we are now providing shall be printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think not. These reports that we are now providing for are annual reports. They are printed from year to year, and there can not be stored away any of these reports which have not yet been printed.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I am not referring especially to the reports for this year; but I say, have we not stored away copies

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It may be that some such are stored away.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Is it not true that we have been called upon to provide a storehouse for these documents? Has not the Government been called on to rent various places for the storage of documents of this kind?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for our printing these documents when it has been demonstrated by actual experience that nobody wants them; that nobody will take them? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman as-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman assumes a little too much when he says that "nobody" wants them. Because of the fact that we find here occasionally a number of members, two or three or a half-dozen, who do not want them, and thereby these works accumulate, that does not represent the whole number by any means. We take the publications as a rule, and are glad to get them and send them out. I would like to have more of them myself. We send all out that we can get. There will be no accumulation of these I am satisfied.

Mr. Chairman, these publications mentioned in the paragraph of the bill we are now considering are the annual publications of the Government; and I beg the attention of the committee to of the Government; and I beg the attention of the committee to this fact, that we have reduced every one of them, I believe without exception, largely. Take the one that has just been read, the report of the Bureau of Ethnology. There is a reduction by this bill in that publication of 7,500 copies. They cost about $2.25 a copy, as near as I can get at it; at all events a little over $2. So that in this one publication, by the amendment of the committee in reporting this bill, we have saved $15,000 a year to the Government, and therefore it seems to me it ought to be passed without objection. to be passed without objection.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Ought it to pass if we can save $10.-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think we have reduced the number as low as possible with safety to the Government. We called the superintendent of the Bureau before us, and he testified that this number of copies that we left in the bill is absolutely necessary for distribution.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Let me ask the gentleman further, do you think that the provision for 3,000 copies of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, for the use of the House, is absolutely

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think so. a very good and important publication. It is a valuable work certainly; a very valuable one to many members from sections where there are scientific schools or establishments of that kind. There is quite a demand for it in many parts of the country.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee what is the purpose of the work?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is the report on eth-

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but what is the object of publishing it by the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the gentleman ever

Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir; I have. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then the gentleman is just as competent to testify as I am.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman answers my question by asking another. I hope he will give the information I have asked

I can not say, of course, from Texas. If he would Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. what would suit the taste of my friend from Texas. If he would like to inquire and learn anything about ethnology he will find the information in this work.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. What proposition is pending before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending. The Chair has been indulging this debate by consent of the com-

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Then I will offer an amendment if

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me I will move to strike out the last word, a pro forma amendment.

I was going on to say, Mr. Chairman, that these are very scientific and valuable productions, and are valuable not only to ourselves and our Government, but to all scientific people every-where. I do not undertake to say that they would suit my friend from Texas, or his taste for literature, but they do suit the taste of many people. Mr. BAILEY. That is precisely the point that I wanted to dewelop. Then this is an effort to promote science, as I understand it. Now, the only power of Congress to promote science is derived from the Constitution which expressly authorizes it "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts." How? Not by publishing and distributing such works as these, but by securing to authors and inventors the exclusive use of their writings or inventions for a limited time. And, as I take it, when Congress has done that it has exhausted its power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts. the progress of science and the useful arts.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to this section, or paragraph, of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by increasing the number in line 46, page 35, to "14,000;" and in line 47 change "1,000" to "3,000," and "2,000" to "6,000."

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman in charge of this bill, the chairman of the committee, will give me his attention, I desire to say that this is one of the most valuable publication; made by the Government. The demand for it by the institutions of learning, and by gentlemen of culture throughout the country, is as great relatively as the demand for the Agricultural Porces. ricultural Report.

I believe, therefore, that while I might agree with the gentle-man from Texas [Mr. Bailey] as to the paternalism of the Gov-ernment involved in this question, and that I might justify my-self in voting against publishing anything whatever by the Government, yet, if we do publish these books, I favor the publica-tion of the valuable ones which are most sought after and are believed to be most useful as a means of conveying information The Committee on Printing, instead of reducing to the people. the numbers of these books that outside parties are entitled to, have cut down the number that members of Congress have hitherto received, from 6,000 to 2,000, and have increased the number for the Bureau of Ethnology.

I can see no reason why we, the representatives of the people, in appropriating the money for publications for our constituents, shall not have the right to control the distribution of those documents in a ratable proportion among our districts, without the intervention of people who may distribute them entirely in a few sections, and to a few institutions and persons. If this number is to be 5,000 for the Bureau of Ethnology, then the number ought to be increased, as my amendment proposes, for the Senate and the House. There is no reason why this Bureau of Ethnology should have the right, with the little knowledge they have of the people requiring them in our several districts, to distribute them as they please, without consulting members of the Senate or House.

Therefore if the number is to remain as the Committee on Printing have reported it, at 5,000 for the Bureau of Ethnology, the number ought to be increased at least to 6,000 for this House of 356 members. I am in favor of economy as much as any gentleman can be, but I dislike this cheese-paring economy in small matters that we sometimes see in this House, and which excites the contempt and derision of the country. If we are going to print these books, let us print the valuable ones, and print them in such quantities that it will be worth while to take the trouble to distribute them. The number now reported will give us but 6 volumes apiece, to be distributed among an average population of 30,000 voters, whereas we ought to have more than double that number to supply the public libraries alone.

Mr. SIMPSON. I wish to offer an amendment to the amend-

ment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it up.
Mr. SIMPSON. After the word "copies," in line 47, add the word "two," and strike out the word "one." And in the same line, after the word "Senate," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five;" and in line 48 strike out the word "five"
and add the word "one;" so as to read:
Of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, $,000 copies—2,000 for the Senate, 5,000 for the House, and 1,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

I think that will owned the evil compalence of

Of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, 8,000 copies—2,000 for the Senate, 5,000 for the House, and 1,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

I think that will cure the evil complained of.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. That proposition being voted on first, if it is adopted I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I think that will cure the evil the gentleman complains of, of giving so large a proportion to the Bureau. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] that this is a very valuable book, which ought to go out to the people. There is a large demand for it in my country. Perhaps in the district of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hall] they will consider it, like him, stuff and rot; but in my country, and in the gentleman's State, I am satisfied that there is a large demand for the book.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman know whether I,000 copies will be sufficient for the Bureau to enable them to make the exchanges that they make with the various nations of the earth?

Mr. SIMPSON. I should think it would be plenty.

Mr. PICKLER. I would not want to cut them below what they ought to have for making these exchanges.

Mr. FIGHER. I would not want to cut then below what they ought to have for making these exchanges.

Mr. SIMPSON. That will be a sufficient number.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion, generally speaking, that the less members of Congress and Senators have to do with anything in this Government, outside of the duties of legislation, the betterfor them and for the people.

There is a great deal of selfishness in everything, and I understand that; and I have it to as large an extent as the average member of the body of which I am a member. I understand perfectly the feeling upon the part of a member of Congress that he is the proper party to distribute documents; but it is a mistaken feeling, and I think the sooner we go back to the idea that these documents are published for the purpose of disseminating useful information among the people and not for the purpose of being used by us in order to advance our own political fortunes the better for the United States, and, in the long run, the better for us.

for us. Mr. DAVIS. But who knows better the people of the various

Mr. DAVIS. But who knows better the people of the various districts than the Representatives from those districts?
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah, Mr. Chairman, no man knows the people of the Fifth district of Mississippi better than I do, and nobody knows better where a public document will aid in my redlection than I do.
Mr. DOOLITTLE. Do you not want to be redlected?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, the people can get these documents just as well through the Departments; and the Departments, as we all know, will take, above all things else, a list from a member of Congress and advice from him as to how to distribute these documents.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he ever tried that experiment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have; and I am trying it to day in the Interior Department.

to-day in the Interior Department.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Have you ever gone to one of those bureaus with twenty-five or fifty names and gota favorable reply?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will say this, that I am a new member of Congress, and do not pretend to know the one hundred and sixty-fifth part of what I ought to know, much less what is to be known about things lying around loose in Washington about the Departments [laughter]; but I do know this, that one of the first communications I we say from the Agrithat one of the first communications I received from the Agricultural Department was to send a number of names of parties to whom I wanted articles distributed. One of the first communi-cations I received from the Interior Department was a like communication, and I was glad to comply with both so far as that was concerned.

Now, what I want to impress upon the committee is that we should control this distribution which is carried on at a large

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I want to ask the gentleman when he received that communication from the Agricultural Department did not they suggest to him that the gentleman's name should be sent on the articles to be sent from that Department, so that the parties receiving them would understand that the gentleman had sent

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I believe they did.
Mr. SIMPSON. Well, then, did not that have the same effect as if the gentleman had sent them, and while the Departments are distributing them in this way, at your request, are you not are distributing them in this way, at your request, are you not in effect distributing the books?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am not talking about the effect, but I will come to it in this way. In my district, Senators distribute documents; in my district I distribute them, and the Department also distribute them. Here is a man known to be a live, talking Democrat. He gets four documents; and another man, who, perhaps, would get more good out of these documents, gets none. Now, my idea is that the object of these publications is to distribute them where they will do the most good. The next sets none. Now, my does is that the object of these publications is to distribute them where they will do the most good. The next idea in my mind is this, that the very main object in the mind of the Democratic party at present is to put the Government back upon an economic footing. Now, you have just had the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations calling your attention to the fact that if we are to go on increasing these reports of committees that there will come up behind us the necessity fluid to the set of the set sity finally to make appropriations to pay for these things. I shall oppose this proposition, and I desire to offer amendments to the section.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment? I know he wants to be fair. Now, he thinks that these 5,000 copies should be left for distribution by the Department. You leave them in control of their distribution. I think it is dangerous legislation to leave them for their distribution, and it is a matter of patronage with the Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will offer an amendment that I think the gentleman will agree to, that this distribution shall be given with the advice of the Senators and Representatives from the State. The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Penn-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman so that he may offer his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am going to offer some amendments which are rather radical in their nature. In lines 12 and 13-

The Chair will state to the gentleman The CHAIRMAN. that there is an amendment now pending, and an amendment to the amendment. At this stage a substitute would be inorder. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that these amendments offered by these gentlemen ought not to prevail. If we are going to economize, the only way to do it is to reduce the number of documents printed. We have reduced this to reduce the number of documents printed. We have reduced this from 15,500 to 8,000, a saving of about $15,000 or $16,000 in this one publication. Now, the distribution we make is 1,000 for the Senate and 2,000 for the House and 5,000 for the Department. Now, I say—

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not do that, I must That is the best distribution that could be make this statement. made of this document.

I assertthat, Mr. Chairman. Gentlemen go upon the idea that if the Department gets these copies they are lost to the country, but if my friend, after distributing his share, wants to get a con or 2 copies, or 3 copies, all he has to do is to ask the chief of this bureau to supply A, B, or C with a copy or copies of the document, and if the chief has got them he will send them to the gentheman's constituent and accompany them with a letter stating that they are sent at the request of the Representative. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] complains gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] complains that each member does not get enough of these documents under the bill, but what does he propose? He says that the number proposed in the bill, 6, is not sufficient, that it must be increased, and thereupon he proposes to increase it to 11. Now, if 6 copies will not meet the demand, certainly 11 will not.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. It will come nearer to it, though.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] comes along and proposes to increase the number so that each member shall have about 13.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not increase the number to be printed at all.

Mr.RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You do increase the anowance of members, though, giving them about 13 each, instead of 6, as the bill proposes. Now, each member represents about from 30,000 to 35,000 male voters and there are about as many the control of the contro ladies, making 60,000 or 70,000 grown people in each district. It is obvious that you can not supply all those people with 13 or with 11 copies of these documents any more than you could with 6, and I insist that we ought not to undertake to supply anything like the demand that may be created in a Congressional district for a valuable publication like this. Let each member have 6 copies, and inasmuch as this is more or less a scientific publication, if he wants to supply the libraries in his district, he will have his 6 copies for that purpose, but we can not undertake to meet the whole demand unless we are prepared to bankrupt the Treasury. I think we have provided copies enough. I think we ought to begin to economize and to keep it up upon every Government publication. The Committee on Printing, recognizing that, have put the knife to every annual publication of the Government, except that of the Department of Agriculture. Gentlemen here have railed about discrimination against the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, but the fact is that we have treated that more liberally than any other publication; we make no reduction in the number of the Agricultural Reports published, while, as I say, we have applied the knife to every other publication; and I do insist that members on this side of the House especially ought not to increase these publications beyond the number contained in the bill. Gentlemen have demanded that we shall economize, and the only way to do it is to reduce the number of these documents published, and the committee propose to do that.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman yield for a ques-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Well, I will move to strike out the last word, and ask him a question which he may answer in my If these publications are made, as I understand they are, for the benefit of institutions of learning and public libraries, ought we not to publish enough of them to be able to send a copy to each public library in our districts? This allowance of 6 copies, which the gentleman proposes, is not half enough to supply the libraries in my district, and will compel me to make an unpleasant discrimination against a majority of these beneficent institutions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This bill provides that whenever there is an edition of 5,000 copies printed, 10 per cent of them shall be sent to the superintendent of documents in the Interior Department, and he apportions them to the designated depositories throughout the country, so that the gentleman's district will get its share.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That number—500—will not allow members and Senators more than 1 additional volume, for there are 440 members and Senators in both bodies

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There are 6 copies for

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Well, there are fourteen public libraries in my district, and even if I should get the odd volume which his generosity offers I would have only 7 copies.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But they are not all designations.

mated depositories.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. They are all designated depositories under the law, and can not get these books under this provision, and I hold that in printing a valuable book like this, while we do not undertake to distribute it indiscriminately, we ought to print enough copies to be able to supply all the public libraries with

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You can not do that with-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesses. Fou can not do that without bankrupting the Government.

Mr BELTZHOOVER. Oh, it is a mere pretense to assert that this would bankrupt the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas

Mr. SIMPSON. Before that vote is taken, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that my amendment does not increase the number of these documents to be printed. It merely takes 4,000 copies from these documents to be printed. It merely takes 4,000 copies from the bureau and distributes them amongst the members of the House and the Senate. Therefore it does not increase the expense of the publication at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMP-SON], which will be reported by the Clerk. The amendment was send as follows:

read, as follows:

Page 33, line 47, strike out "one" after the word "copies" and insert "two:" same line strike out "two" after the word "Senate" and insert "five;" line 48, after the word "and," strike out "five" and insert "one," so that the provision will read: "Of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, 8,000 copies; 2,000 for the Senate, 5,000 for the House, and 1,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beltz-Hoover] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON]

The amendment as amended was adopted. The Clerk read the following:

Of the report of the Geological Survey, 12,000 copies; 3,000 for the Senate, 6,000 for the House, 3,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out after the word "copies" the word "three," and inserting "two;" by striking out after the word "Senate" the word "six," and inserting "eight;" and by striking out after the word "House" the word "three," and inserting "two," so that the paragraph will read:

Of the report of the Geological Survey, 12,000 copies; 2,000 for the Senate, 8,000 for the House, and 2,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. Chairman, the document referred to in this paragraph is valuable, and one which members of Congress are frequently called on to supply. I do not see why the Senate should have a greater proportionate number of this document than the House; nor do I see why we should assign for distribution by the bureau a greater number of copies than my amendment provides for. No member can supply all the demands that are made upon him for this publication. I think the amendment I have offered contemplates an equitable distribution, and I do not see why it contemplates an equitable distribution, and I do not see why it should not be accepted by the chairman of the committee. It does not increase the aggregate number of volumes, but simply changes the proportionate distribution. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand, this amendment does not increase the aggregate number to be printed, but simply provides a change as to the distribution. I have no idea that the Senate will agree to this proposition, but I do not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The following reports required by law to be made to Congress shall not be printed unless the printing be recommended by the head of the Department making the same, and ordered by concurrent resolution of Congress, namely: Report of contracts for conveying the mails, report of fines and deductions in the Post-Office Department, and accounts of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and the report of the proceedings of the annual meetings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In order to make the paragraph just read more intelligible, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 203 and 204 the words: "And accounts of the First Comptroller of the Treasury," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the report of the Treasury accounts by him from time to time rendered to and settled with the First Comptroller."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Of the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, 10,000 copies; 1,000 for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, and 7,000 for distribution by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The committee inadvert-ently omitted one of the annual publications. To remedy the omission, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 241 insert the following:
"The annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation in the Treasury epartment, 1,000 copies for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House, 1,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner; and of the annual List of Merchant Vessels of the United States, 5,000 copies for distribution by the Treasury Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Vice-President and each Senator, 44 copies; and to the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, each 25 copies; to each Representative and Delegate, 22 copies; and to Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, each 25 copies; to be supplied daily as originally published or in the revised and permanent form bound only in half Russia, or part in each form, as each may elect

Mr. PICKLER. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read, the following:

Provided, That there shall be 20 additional copies of the Congressional Record of the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress furnished each Representative and Delegate.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in view of the important matters which have been discussed during this extraordinary ssion, and the special demand that there is for the CONGRE SIONAL RECORD containing our proceedings, it would be well to provide for this small increase, only 20 additional copies for each Representative and Delegate. There has never before, I believe, been such general interest in our proceedings and such a desire on the part of the people to understand what is being discussed by members

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. As a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler] I move to amend by inserting after the words "may elect" the following: To each of such eight public or school libraries as shall be designated for this urpose by each Representative and Delegate in Congress, one copy of the purpose by each

Mr. Chairman, this is a substantial amendment and one of a permanent nature, intended to control to the extent stated the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD hereafter. I agree entirely with the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi against putting into the hands of members of Congress the promiscuous distribution of public documents. I believe that no great good is subserved thereby. I do not subscribe to any proposition which treats documents printed for public distribution as osition which treats documents printed for public distribution as the personal perquisites of members of Congress.

This amendment proposes to place copies of the CONGRES-SIONAL RECORD, not where they will advance the fortunes or ambition of any individual, but where they will supply a want of the public. We have already a like provision with reference to the distribution of the Patent Office Gazette. Each member of Congress is allowed to name eight libraries in his Congressional district where the Patent Office Gazette shall be deposited, so that it may be within the reach of those who desire to refer to it. The provision of my amendment will virtually increase the number of copies allowed to each member in a much larger proportion than may appear on the face of the proposition. If you put 8 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in libraries to be designated by the Representative—where they can be consulted by the public who have access to those libraries, you serve one hundred times more people than if those 8 copies were placed at the personal disposition of the member.

If you give the members of this House the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for personal distribution, they will go to personal or political friends or perhaps the newspapers, and undoubtedly to that extent you will aid in the distribution of the RECORD. But if you put them in a library, or a permanent institution—eight designated in each Congressional district that will be within the reach of the people generally-they can be then used as works of reference and reach a very much larger number of the people than they can possibly reach under the present system of distribution.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman tell me how many districts there are in the United States that have eight public libraries:

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I am not able to state to the gentleman how many districts are supplied with the number of pub-lic libraries I have designated. I am sorry to think there would be any Congressional district within the limits of the United States in which you could not find at least eight libraries. My States in which you could not find at least eight libraries. My amendment prescribes no particular kind of library. It may be a high-school library, an academic library, a town library, or a county library, or a city library. The matter of the distribution to the various libraries of whatever character, would be left entirely to the members themselves, and it would be supposed that they would designate those libraries which would be most accessible to the greatest number of people. I scarcely think there is a Congressional district in the United States in which there could not be found at least eight libraries, of some character, suitable to receive this publication. If there be no such number in any district in the country, then I am in favor of sending this work and laying the foundation of such libraries by furnishing them to begin with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Now, the RECORD is fast becoming a work of reference, and it is mainly as a work of reference that it is valuable. It is often the case that the constituents of the members on this floor de-Bire to know simply how a vote was had on a certain question, how their Representative was recorded upon it. Perhaps that is all the RECORD would be required for ordinarily. If there is a place in the county where it is known that the RECORD is kept on file in current numbers, where parties can refer to it and see how the Representatives have voted on or discussed such and such questions, at such and such times, it would be a very great convenience to the people. This amendment would also greatly relieve members of Congress without taking away any of the number of Records now allowed them under existing law.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment. I understand the gentleman from Indiana has offered a substitute. If proper, this perhaps may be regarded as an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment will be

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 76, on page 43, line 292, strike out "twenty-two," and insert in lieu thereof "fifty."

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in support of that amendment I simply desire to say this, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is one of the most valuable documents to our constituents that we can possibly secure for them from the Government. Now, most of us have a number of counties in our Congressional districts—I have in mine, nine, or will have at the next tion. I have ten now, and under the present arrangement I have but two copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that I can furnish to each of the different counties.

I am proud to say that in my district I have fourteen public libraries. I furnish to each public library a copy of the Congressional Record, and I have plenty of calls from constituents outside for copies of this publication. I believe if we would spend more money in furnishing additional copies of the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD and less money in publishing worthless documents the people of this country will be much better served.

I believe this amendment which gives to each member fifty copies instead of twenty-two ought to meet the sanction and approval of every member of this body.

Mr. COFFFEN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the circumstances, we have an amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota, and an amendment just offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] to that amendment, and a substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I offered mine as an amendment to the substitute, because, as I understood it, there was an amendment to the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. No, the Chair regards it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. COFFEEN. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. The number of copies which the members receive of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD if considerably increased would be highly appreciated by our constituents. Now, a word as to to the subject of the distribution of these documents generally. The argument that those who distribute them independently of the members of Congress are supposed to do it more impartially I think is not correctly founded. A member of Congress not only knows the needs, qualifications, and desires of his constituents and knows the various libraries of his district, but is better able to determine what character of Government publications each one ought to receive, but also knows what will meet the approved judgment of the people in his district.

Again, touching the merits of the amendment itself. Fifty copies is a small number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for each member of Congress. I have had so many calls for them from libraries, newspapers, political clubs, even from ladies' clubs and societies who take an interest in the State of Wyoming in considering the condition and movement of public affairs and the proceedings of Congress, together with calls from other en-terprising people outside of clubs who want copies for their own use, that I am unable to furnish even a considerable fraction of what is called for.

And one point more, Mr. Chairman, showing why I hope that And one point more, are charman, showing why I hope that this amendment will pass. We provide in this bill for the print-ing of a few copies of the statutes and laws that are passed here in Congress. We make no provision for the general distribu-tion of these laws throughout the United States, among the 65,000,000 people. Those who may oppose this increase in the quota of Congressional Records are moving in the direction of limiting even still further their opportunity to know what laws are passed and what are the purposes of and the arguments for and against those laws. If we do not increase the quota of the CON-GRESSIONAL RECORD it appears to me that there is a little item of inconsistency about it in our actions. Those who would limit the publication of laws and the distribution of the RECORD at the same time, should explain, if they can, why we should hald every man, woman, and child in the United States responsible for any disobedience to our laws and make no just and proper provision for the dissemination of information among the page ple as to what the law is.

All these points taken together justify me in voting for the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Smith], and I hope it will pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Pickler] be reported in order that I may know exactly what

The Clerk will report the amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 296, page 43, insert the following:
"Provided, That there shall be 29 additional copies of the Congressional RECORD of the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress furnished each Representative and Delegate."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], who offers to increase the number to 50 copies, whether he limits it to the extraordinary session?

Mr. SMITH of Ulinois. No; my amendment is to furnish 50 copies to each member of Congress, and let that be permanent. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I want to be heard just for a moment on these amendments.

Theamendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] The amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] offers is a very extravagant one. I have the estimate of the Public Printer, showing that it will cost $5 to furnish one copy of the RECORD to a member. Therefore if you increase the number to 50, you give each member $250 worth of RECORDS. Now, when you multiply that by 360, the number in the House simply, you make an expense of $80,000 by that simple amendment; and if you increase it so as to include the Sentars rous will make it. if you increase it so as to include the Senators, you will make it cost about $120,000 a year.

Mr. PICKLER. The RECORD of this extraordinary session will not cost $5, will it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am speaking now of the regular RECORD of the ordinary session. Of course I am not making any estimate for the extra session now; but I want to show how rapidly it piles up the expense, when we increase the

The amendment offered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] will cost the Government $14,400. It seems to me if we are going to make any additions at all, we ought not to go beyond that.

For myself I am opposed to any increase, but there is a demand on the part of gentlemen whom I recognize as friends of economy, who want an increase in this publication.

If we intend to increase it at all, I will vote for the lowest in crease, that proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CCOPER], but I say we ought not to increase it at all.

I want to make this statement in order that there may go into the RECORD this evening, with these amendments, a statement as to the cost, in order that gentlemen may understand how much they are increasing this cost if they move to make these increases in this publication.

I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dockery, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted: To Mr. Hines, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family. And then, on motion of Mr. SAYERS (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 19, 1893, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 19, 1893.

[Continuation of legislative proceedings of Tuesday, October 17, 1893.] The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m., at the expiration of the

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes its session. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] to amend the Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative day which will be stated. The Secretary read as follows:

That the name of H. M. TBLLER, a Senator from Colorado, be added to the last roll call recorded in the Journal of yesterday, made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum of the Senate was present or not.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, much has been said with regard to the power of the Senate to make its own rules. There be no doubt about that power.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suggest that there is not a quorum present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen. Butler. Dixon. Dolph. Faulkner. Gallinger George, Harris, Hoar, Stewart, Teller, Voorhees Walthall. Perkins, Kyle, McPherson. Shoup, Smith, Frye.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Twenty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is no quorum present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

the order of the Senate.

After some delay, Mr. Cullom, Mr. Washburn, Mr. White of Louisiana, Mr. Stockbridge, Mr. Vest, Mr. Davis, Mr. Wolcott, Mr. Proctor, Mr. Roach, Mr. Hawley, Mr. Vance, Mr. Hill, Mr. Vilas, Mr. Bate, Mr. Carey, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Berry, Mr. Higgins, Mr. Dubois, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Gray and Mr. Cameron entered the Chamber and answered to their names. The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 10 o'clock and 26 minutes a. m.)

Forty four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Mr. ALLEN. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives; which will be read by title and appropriately referred.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 2344) for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a point of order.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada will state his point of order.

Mr. STEWART. My point of order is that no business is in order until the Journal has been approved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that it is in order to read by title and refer bills from the House of Representatives. The bill just read by title will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 86) for the protection of persons furnishing materials and labor for the construction of public works was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 3130) to repeal in part and to limit section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senator from Nevada to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEWART. For what purpose?
Mr. VOORHEES. It is for this purpose: I desire to ask unanimous consent that communications from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Finance Committee upon important public matters may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. STEWART. I do not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Mc-Pherson] will present them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of September 22, 1893, a statement as to the num-ber of standard silver dollars coined under the act of February 28, 1878, and July 14, 1890, exported and imported since February 28, 1878; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a statement relative to the redemption of silver certificates in gold, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSACTIONS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire, in accordance with the request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to present the report of that committee with a communication from the Secretary upon a resolution-Mr. STEWART. I

I object to any business until the Journal has been approved. I have the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. This is the business for which I asked the nanimous consent of the Senate, and for which the Senator from Novada was kind enough to yield.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, this is part of it. I will yield.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will state to the Senator from Nevada that it is a report upon the resolution introduced by himself in respect to the probable deficiency in the revenues, and I think the Senator would like very much to have the information. Therefore I will send the report of the committee upon that resolution to the desk, and also the report of the committee and the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansus [Mr. Peffer] in respect to the conduct of action of the conduct of action of the secretary of the sec duct of national banks. I think the report should be read in both cases and then printed for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reports will be received.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. Peffer August 22, 1893, submitted the following report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

First. For official information in regard to the manner in which the afters of national banks are conducted, the Comptroller relies chiefly upon their sworn reports of condition, which, under the requirements of law, he calls for five times a year, and upon reports furnished him by the national-bank examiners, who make examinations by personal visits to the banks at such times as the Comptroller directs.

The last reports of condition made to the Comptroller by the banks in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, for July 12, 1893, disclosed in some cases excessive loans or deficiency in lawful money reserve, and the same statement applies to the reports made by examiners; the last-named reports being sent in to the Comptroller at no fixed date, but only as examinations are made from time to time.

Second. The Comptroller has received no official information showing that national banks in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia are not paying depositors checks in lawful money, and no complaint has been received by the Comptroller from any depositor in a national bank to this effect during the recent financial stringency.

APPREHENDED DEFICIENCY OF REVENUES.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART August 28, 1893, made the following report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. McPherson, from the Committee on Finance, submitted a report upon iscellaneous Document 33, resolution by Mr. Stewart, as follows:

[Senate Mis. Doc. No. 33, Fifty-third Congress, first session.]

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution:
"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to inform the Senate whether there is danger of a deficiency in the revenues of the Government during the current year, and if so, what is the probable amount of such deliciency and is any legislation necessary to supply such deficiency."

The resolution was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his reply is appended:

MEMORANDUM OF ESTIMATES AND OPERATIONS OF THE TREASURY FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1894.

The estimated receipts of the public revenues, as submitted by this Department to the last Congress for the present fiscal year, less the estimated receipts of the postal revenues, amount to the gross sum of $403,000,000; and the estimated expenditures for 'be same period in round numbers, excluding the estimated expenditures for 'be same period in round numbers, excluding the estimated expenditures for 'be same period in round numbers, excluding times, with the exception indicated, of $37,000,000, showing an estimate dexcess for the year of receipts over expenditures for the entire year, and he is not possible to determine their accuracy from the operations of the Treasury for the present or prior months of the current fiscal year.

The above estimates of receipts for the current year divided by twelve would show an average monthly receipt of $33,750,000; and the estimated expenditure divided in the same way would show an average monthly expenditure of a sum a little in excess of $31,000,000.

The actual receipts of the Treasury, however, for the months of July, August, and September amount to the sum of $79,379,417.59; or a monthly average estimated receipts for the entire year, and showing for the first three months of the last fiscal year. Should the autual receipts for the first three months of the last fiscal year. Should the autual receipts for the first three months of the last fiscal year. Should the autual receipts for the entire year.

The actual expenditures of the Treasury for the months of July, August, and September amount to $83,459,000,800, sp. 39, 378, 375. 75 in excess of the average monthly estimates; and if the expenditures should continue at the same rate during the balance of the current year they would amount to the sum of $33,836,508.96, or about $20,336,508.96 in excess of the estimated expenditures for that period, and would show an excess of expenditures over the supposed actual receipts for the year estimated of, say, $76,318,835.74.

As stated, the operations of the Treasury perati

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a pension bill for reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1094) granting a pension to Edmund C. Bailey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] to amend the Journal of Monday's proceedings, on which the Senator from Nevada 'Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, as I remarked, there is no doubt about the power and the duty of the Senate to make rules. The Constitution expressly authorizes the Senate to make its own rules. Rules are important, and they are for the protection of the minority in times of great excitement, in times when pas-ston and prejudice inspire the majority to override and crush out all opposition. Rules are made in view of the weakness of humanity. It is well understood that at times the best of men are governed by their passions and are liable to do wrong. Ma-jorities again and again have been led into despotic and cruel It is well understood that at times the best of men proceedings. Innocent people have been imprisoned, punished, exterminated by the enthusiasm and power of the majority.

All the woes of humanity result from the violent proceedings

All the woes of humanity result from the violent proceedings of the majority. During all history we have a continuous record of the cruelties and oppressions of even conscientious men when they were the majority. There was a time when the majority in power felt it a duty to burn at the stake and torture those who differed with them on matters of religion. There was a time when a majority of the people believed in witchcraft, and inflicted the most dire penalties upon those who were charged with an imaginary offense.

Rules are framed to check violent action on the port of the Rules are framed to check violent action on the part of the majority until there can be reflection; until the sober second thought and judgment of the majority of the people can be brought into exercise.

brought into exercise.

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say. "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority, against the attempts of power."

So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense, that as its always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power, are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House; by a strict adherence to which, the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and a buses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

With represent the form the second of the same to such a treation.

With regard to free debate in the Senate, I call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the history of the great struggle which is not yet effaced from the memory of the people of the United States, when in the year 1850 there was a majority in favor of extending slavery into California. There was a struggle here under the rules of the Senate for between six and seven months, which resulted in the compromise measures of 1850. Again in 1854-755, and forseveral years previous to 1860, there was a struggle on the part of the majority to extend slavery into the Territories, which was stubbornly resisted. There are a large number of people in this country who believe that the resistance then made was justifiable; that great and good results have followed from it. Again, there was an overwhelming majority for extending suffrage to Chinese. A small minority resisted it until that attempt was abandoned. All men now approve of the failure of that action.

Again there was an attempt on the part of the majority to place the control of local elections under Federal authority. That was resisted by the minority; and the result is regarded by a large portion of the American people as the most glorious of any that has been achieved in this country.

In view of these great struggles, in view of the benefits that have been realized, in view of the fact that liberty has been maintained, that our institutions have been preserved in this hall by the exercise of the power of resistance granted to the minority by the rules of this body, which have obtained since the foundation of the Government, it seems that this is not a time to destroy those rules, in a contest like the present, after great good has been accomplished by resistance to the power of the majority exercised under pressure, exercised under passion, exercised and pressed forward by influences which are not commendable and honest, which I must discuss in order to bring this matter more fully before the Senate. I say after these contasts have been had almost invariably the Senate, in its cooler moments, has considered its rules and has made such limitations as it thought proper. It has provided that an amendment may be laid on the table without currying the bill with it.

That facilitates business very much. It has also provided that the merning hour shall be extended from 12 o'clock until 2; that from the time of meeting two hours shall be given for morning business, under which all bills on the Calendar come up for consideration under a five-minute rule, allowing five minutes to each Senator for debate. That rule has facilitated business. The various modifications that have been made of the rules have enabled the Senate during all these years to perform its business more rapidly than the other House. There is no difficulty in getting the consideration of any measure in the Senate.

Frequently in the other House, under its arbitrary rules, just measures are necessarily left out and can not be considered. The arbitrary rules of the House have been a cause of much com-plaint and much injustice in depriving citizens from obtaining such legislation as the country and as justice demanded that they should have. But the Senate has always been foremost in its business; and in considering the matter in its cooler moments, after passion had given way, and in making such limitations as will facilitate business, it has not taken away the right to resist will facilitate business, it has not taken away the right to resist in case of an emergency like this.

Now, while the Senate has the power to make rules, it has power to make rules to protect the minority, and it has made those rules, and when the majority wish to press forward to accomplish what the minority think a great outrage, it is no time to change the rules. Always for the last hundred years, when the majority have been found in a great struggle, the suggestion has come to change the rule. What is the use of rules to protect the minority, if the majority may change them whenever passion, or prejudice, or a desire to accomplish an object inspires them to bring forward a change of the rules. Rules can not project the minority if they can be changed under such can not protect the minority if they can be changed under such circumstances.

The good sense of the Senate and the good sense of the country has insisted that there should be one place where the rules shall not be changed in an emergency. There is nothing for the protection of the minority if the majority may in the heat of passion change the rules at will.

I have here a paper laid on my desk this morning, a leading daily paper, the Springfield (Mass.) Daily Republican, which is in harmony with the whole of this clamor.

This rebellion

Calling the resistance here a rebellion!

This rebellion shelters itself under a rule of the Senate which allows to its members unlimited debate, so that no vote can be taken so long as any Senator chooses to speak. Under the present circumstances, it is impossible to change the rule, because a motion for a change can in its turn be endlessly debated, and a vote prevented. The Senate is securely tied by its own rule, and the nation is a bound and helpless prisoner.

I think the communication is so important, and it is so clearly in harmony with all that is said, that with the permission of the Senate I will have the whole editorial inserted in my remarks.

The article is as follows:

THE WAY OUT.

Senate I will have the whole editorial inserted in my remarks. The article is as follows:

THE WAY OUT.

The Government of the nation to-day is paralyzed. The main function of Congress is denied its normal exercise. The Federal Legislature is unable to legislate. The majority of the Senate is forbidden to give expression and force to its will in the manner provided by the Constitution and followed since the foundation of the Government. The Senate is by a minority of its members forbidden to take a vote.

The immediate effect of this nullification is to stop all legislation, to grievously embarrass the business finterests of the whole country, and to threaten protracted suffering to millions of citizens. Its turther effect as a precedent is to enable an obstinate minority at any time to block the whole machinery of legislation. It strikes dumb the voice of the people through the very organization provided to declare that voice. It is making our Government contemptible in the eyes of its own people and of the world. In a word, it is anarchy under color of law.

This rebellion shelters itself under a rule of the Senate, which allows to its members unlimited debate, so that no vote can be taken so long as any Senator chooses to speak. Under the present circumstances, it is impossible to change the rule, because a motion for a change can in its turn be endiessly debated and a vote prevented. The Senate is securely tied by its own rule, and the nation is a bound and helpless prisoner.

The resource is to cut the knot. Let the majority of the Senate, making common cause in the interest which is higher than party, higher than finance—the sacrafight of constitutional self-government—let the majority of the Senate and to the Vice-President, acting as the loyal servant of the Senate and the principle commends itself to the judgment of the majority of the Senate and to the Vice-President acting as the loyal servant of the Senate and the principle commends itself to the indignate of the senate is a resolution of legislatio without precedent, and to many seemed to partake of usurpation. But when measures which his action had helped to pass were challenged before the Supreme Court, that body refused to annul them. In effect, it declined to interfere with the course of the House and its elected Speaker in determining its course of procedure upon a somewhat nice and doubtful question. It is add in effect: The essential principles of the Constitution not being violated, the National House must settle details as to its own methods of business. Can it be supposed that the court would assume to so interpret and enforce an sneient rule of the Senate as to leave that body powerless to act? It is most unlikely that the court will be asked to do so. But the possibility of such an appeal may reassure any who fear it would be illegal for the Senate to assume its proper function by a short way.

Would there be danger of a bad precedent in thus ignoring a rule? Such danger is trivial compared to the imminent peril of a paisy of the Legislature, and the discredit of all government. Is precedent wanted for so bold a course? History gives a precedent. When John Quincy Adams was in the House, once during its organizat on and before the election of Speaker there arose disputes over certificates of membership which at last interrupted all progress; the Clerk, who was regularly the temporary presiding officer, rused to entertain motions designed to end the chaos; and legislative anarchy seemed—just as now—to impend. Mr. Adams made a reasonable and proper motion, which the Clerk refused to submit to the House. "Gentlemen," said Mr. Adams, "I propose to put this question myself!" The right and reason and courage of his action won the assent of the House, he put the motion and it was carried; the organization was completed, and the normal functions of government were resumed.

Salus populisupremalex—the selection of the Euchapitalities must be subordinated to vital inecessities. This is such an emergency. Let the majority of the Senate rise to the occas

In this emergency let American common sense and courage not fail in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it becomes pertinent to inquire what is the emergency calling for this action. With regard to that I have a few suggestions to make. The emergency is an attempt on the part of the national banks and the creditor class to control all the departments of the Government It is the fourth attempt that has been made in the history of the country.

The first memorable attempt was in 1811, when the charter of the National Bank was about to expire. The National Bank then created a panic, using the same methods that have been employed on this occasion.

The next was in 1833, when the President came to the con-clusion that the National Bank was an unsafe place for the deposit of the money of the Government, and the action then is known as the removal of the deposits, although no deposits were removed. The Secretary of the Treasury simply deposited the new money in other depositories, State depositories, where he thought it would be safe.

The third attempt was in 1881, when Congress proposed to reduce the rate of interest and to issue 3 per cent instead of 4 per cent bonds.

The following is what the leading journals said with regard to the efforts of the bankers to stampede Congress and prevent them reducing interest on bonds from 4 to 3 per cent. The same appliances were then used to create panic which are now employed, except the use of the public press, and they then felt the power of the press. They now have it in their service:

THE BANKERS' GREAT STRIKE—NO TROOPS NEEDED—THE PRESIDENT SURRENDERS—VOTERS, "WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?"

Not long since the New York Tribune remarked:
"The time is near when the banks will feel compelled to act strongly.
Meanwhile a very good thing has been done. The machinery is furnished by which in any emergency, the financial corporations of the East can act together at a single day's notice with such power that no act of Congress can over-come or resist their decision."

And that time arrived last week, when the banks said to Congress, their creator, "You pass a certain law with a certain section in it that we object to, and we will ruin the business of the country!" And they proceeded to partially put their threat into execution—merely to show what they could do when they tried. But a majority of Congress couldn't be bluffed, and the law was passed—but the bankers' tool, President Hayes, vetood it.

Beileving that our readers will be interested in what the great papers of the country have to say on this all-absorbing question, and which vitally affects every one, we gi/e a few extracts:

[Chicago News, 28th.]

[Chicago News, 26th.]

It is rule or ruln with the national banks. When Congress gets down on its honorable knees to the national banks everything will be lovely. Fattening on the Treasury for years the national banks have entered into a conspiracy to wreck the business of the country rather than submit to what they consider unfavorable legislation. The people will remember this against them, and the day of reckoning is not as far off as they imagine.

[New York Commercial, 25th.]

Some of the national banks of this city have played a very contemptible part in the flurry of yesterday and to-day. It is not the first time that they have acted in this way against the public credit. In one instance, which we do not care to name at present, but which will be understood by most Wall street people, the want of loyalty to the public credit has shown itself on all occasions, from the outbreak of the civil war in 1861 down to the present time.

[Chicago Tribune, 26th.]

In point of fact, it would not take much argument to satisfy the country generally that there is no particular necessity for any bank-note currency whatever, and all attempts by the banks to disturb the business of the country by combinations to produce a contraction or stringency can only have the effect of educating the public mind as to the expediency of doing without bank currency as far as possible.

[New York Advertiser, 26th.]

It is a question whether a clique of bankers is to dictate to Congress the country what is for the best interest of the country, and to maniput the money market in order to depress the stock market.

[Leavenworth Times, 2d.]

[Leavenworth Times, 2d.]

The panic in Wall street last Friday and Saturday was something of a tempest in a teapot, and has already blown over. It was—to express it plainly, and in few words—an attempt on the part of the banks to correct the Government, but, as might have been expected, it proved a most signal failure. Borrowing a homely but a very expressive figure of speech from our Southern brethren, the banks "bit off more than they could chaw." Coercing the United States is a very big job, either in war or in finance, as has been clearly demonstrated at two or three times in our national experience, and the gentlemen who control the national banks of the country have read history to very little purpose if they have failed to learn this fact. The long and short of the late financial flurry is simply this: The circulation of the national banks is secured by the deposit of bonds bearing not less than 4 per cent interest.

Congress recently made up its mind that the credit of the United States was just as good as the credit of Great Britain, and since the English public debt has been funded for a century at 3per cent our debt ought not to bear any higher rate. A bill for providing for refunding our debt in 3 per cent bonds and requiring the national banks to deposit those in place of the bonds bearing a higher rate passed the Senate, and seemed likely to pass the House. In order to defeat this, the banks undertook to create a stringency in the money market, and precipitate a financial panic by canceling their circulation and withdrawing their bonds. In view of the fact that the national bank note circulation and monusts to Eado,000,000, the withdrawal of so much bank note circulation amounts to Eado,000,000, the withdrawal of so much currency at one time could not be otherwise than disastrons to the business interests of the country, and hence the banks expected to place Congress where it would be obliged to recede from its position.

[Chicago Inter Ocean.]

where it would be obliged to recede from its position.

[Chicago Inter Ocean.]

The people know that there is no real difference between a national-bank note and a treasury note, except that one is issued directly by the Government, without the intermediate of the bank, and the other directly by the Treasury. The great popular argument of conservative business men against the replacing of national-bank notes by greenbacks is founded on the conviction that it is not safe to trust the control of the circulation with po iticians in Congress, but that it is safer to rely upon banks whose interests are purely commercial. The action of the national banks in New York and elsewhere in attempting to frighten and overawe Congress and compelegislation to suit them, will have a tendency to beget doubt upon this subject and make the public fancy that there is no more to be feared from the first quarter than there is from the last. * * Solong, especially, as the great debt of the country forms the basis of our financial system, and constantly requiring attention and regulation, the Government must not be hampered or impeded by the assumption of unfriendliness on the part of the banks, but must have the power to protect itself and give practical trait of its legislation. If the Government chooses to try a 3 per cent loan, it should not be deterred by threats of withdrawing circulation. * *

The people feel that they are not dependent on banks for a circulating medium. We have learned wisdom from our misfortunes. The selfish greed of the New York banks in 1861 compelled the Government to rely upon itself for currency: and the recent action of the same class of bankers, if persisted in, may compel the Government to take such action as will declare its independence of corporate dictation. * * Neither the people nor the Government will consciously submit to the dictation or control of capital. Government are instituted among men for the benefit of the people nor the Government are instituted among men for the benefit of the peopl gerous powers.

New York Times, 26th.1

The Times, editorially, says the events of yesterday in Wall street show plainly that the speculative spirit has gained very rapidly within the past twelve months. * * When prices fall 5, 10, and 15 per cent in a few hours or even in a few moments, and when men pay at the rate of 472 per cent per annum for the use of money, it is clear that the perations which involves such consequences are not the legitimate operations of national finance, but something which is in its essence gambling. * * * The peculiar relations of the banks to the Wall street market, and the fact that they have taken the initiative in the course, which produced what was for a time a panic, unfortunately complicate general business interests in the transactions of the stock exchange. The prompt interposition of the Treasury Department yesterday, and the feeling that still more effective steps may be taken, would undoubtedly check further disturbances if it was not that it is the interest and settled purpose of a section of operators more or less influential to continue and aggravate the trouble that has taken place.

The principle on which the Carlisle amendment, now so severely codemed, rests is that the banks should redeem their own notes, and the Government should not give them the privilege of curtalling their circulation by the million at a moment's notice. This is not an unwise principle, but the contrary. * * It can not be doubted that the banks have acted in a very hasty spirit, and have themselves shared the feeling that has resulted in symptoms of a panic yesterday. They have forgotten they were in a sense Government banks: that they held franchises of an exceptional character from Congress, and that these were linked with well-defined obligations. Even from a standpoint of their own interest it must be said they were unnecessarily defiant of public opinion, which has and must have very considerable influence on their fortunes.

[New York World, 26th.]

The World editorially says: "The trade and general business of the country has been subjected to a strain during the past week more severe than any which has been put on them since 1873. This deplorable state of saffairs was brought about by the selfish conspiracy of a certain number of national banks bent on opposing the national will in the matter of establishing a lower national rate of interest by such duly chosen representatives of the people of the United States as they have thought proper to adopt. Our Government and people who maintain it have submitted to great sacrifices to afford all reasonable support to national banks. But the banks have not kept within the reasonable limits of their demand for compensation for such financial services as they have been able to render the country.

A few of these banks have not hesitated to invite the destruction of the whole system and provoke popular anger by pursuing a course which must inevitably force on American citizens the question whether legislative and executive officers chosen to represent the people or a few bank officers are to administer the financial destines of this country. It is not probable the natural resentment of the Legislature against the attempted conspiracy will extend to the condemnation of the whole national system. But we have no doubt at the same time that when the indignation has cooled of, those conspirators against the prosperity and credit of the Republic will be subjected to such temperate and wholesome discipline as shall be a warning to them and their kind for years to come.

[New York Sun, 22d.]

and their kind for years to come.

[New York Sun, 22d.]

It strikes us that the gentlemen in Wall street, who are trying to prevent the Senate funding bill from becoming a law, rather make a mistake. Unter the senate funding bill from becoming a law, rather make a mistake. Undeutedly they have a right to express their opinions about the bill, but when it comes to threatening that unless it is modified to meet their views they will wreck the trade of the entire country, they go a step too far. The average Congressman has no such fear of banks and bankers as to make him alter his vote to avoid their displeasure, and as to any possibility of the mischief they may do, he will soon find a way to prevent it. If the officers of the banks should attempt, as some foolish men here say they will do, to withdraw their circulation unless certain provisions in the billi are stricken out, it would be very easy to supply the deficiency with an additional issue of greenbacks, and if they try by underhand means to thwart the negotiation of the new bonds because the rate of interest is not high enough to please them, they can be deprived of the privilegge of issuing circulation altogether.

It is a dangerous thing for the tail to attempt to wag the dog, for if the dog gets angry he can switch the tail about in a very unpleasant way for the dog sets angry he can switch the tail about in a very unpleasant way for the sail The truth is, that in matters of national interest there is no set of people as stupid as the Wall street financiers. Absorbed in the business of buying and selling stocks and lending money, they only consider what immediately affects to-day's markets, without a foresight of the future or regard for what is going on elsewhere. In the present case they are evidently in blissful ignorance of the general hostility of the people of the West and Southwest to the national-bank system and the slender thread of toleration on which it hangs. It needs only a good pretext to secure the sweeping of the whole thing out of exis

The funding bill, as it passed both Houses of Congress, was, in the language of a Washington dispatch, "the most serious blow the national banks ever received from Congress since the organization of the national-banking sys-

The act of January, 1875, clothed the national banks with the power of unlimited and unrestricted contraction and expansion of the currency. It gave them absolute control over the volume of money, and consequently over the market value of labor and all kinds of property. It gave them power to indiate the currency when they could make money through the indiation of prices, and when their interests could be better served by panic, depressed prices, and general business stagnation and bankruptcy, they had power to accomplish their end through the contraction of their circulating notes.

The provisions of the new funding bill materially interfere with their nicely planned scheme, and deprive them of nearly all their power over sudden contractions and inflation. It puts a limit to their privileges, and bounds to their unwarranted powers.

Without waiting even for the concurrence of the House in the slight Senate amendments, a large and powerful bank lobby from Wall street and the clearing house association at once bore down upon the White House armed with magazines. Gatling guns, and infernal machines of dire calamities, which they threatened would surely explode in the very heart of the nation's business and industries from spontaneous ignition, in case he did not interpose his prerogative to save. They were armed with authority from the national banks represented by the American Bankers' Association to inform his excellency that in case he withheld his veto they would immediately retire their circulation. In which case a money stringency would follow which would be terribly disastrous to every business interest, producing the most runous financial crash which ever befell the country.

ruinous financial crash which ever befell the country.

The peopl's are not without resources, though every bank note be retired, for when the emergency shall arise, the greenback which put down the slave-holders' rebellion will also put down the bankers' insurrection.

In more than one sense the greenback is "war money." It has proved itself mightler than an army with banners. It was the oid reliable guard that never lost a battle or suffered defeat. It conquered slaveccracy, and can and will conquer bankocracy, plutocracy, and monopoly. It is the people's hope and trust in every time of need.

Let the bank note cowardly and traitorously retire from the conflict, and let the greenback be clothed with full sovereign powers, come to the front, and come to stay. As fast as bank notes disappear let greenbacks fill the ranks. On this point the New York Graphic thus expresses itself:

"It is understood that there is to be an amendment offered in the House to the bill providing for the issue of greenbacks to take the place of bank circulation that may be withdrawn. If this sensible precaution is taken it will instantly restore confidence and take permanently away from the banks this fearful power to withdraw in one day all their bills from circuladon, or what is worse, lock up an equal amount of gold and legal tenders and leave the street utterly without means of doing business. Such terrible power no se. of men should for one instant posses."

In vindication of its own honor and dignity, as well as in response to the demands and interest of business, Congress should not be slow to rebuke the insolence of these creatures of law and dependents on public forbearance. Should the President interpose his veto let the issue be carried to the people as expressed by their representatives.

And the New York Tribune, 28th, the organ of the banks, contains the following ominous threats and defiance to the whole Republican party surrentors.

surrender, and Hayes and Garfield, and the whole Republican party surrenders. Read:

"The country knows that it has escaped a great disaster. Everywhere there is a feeling of intense relief and thankfulness, as substantial people come to realize how terrible a revulsion the enactment of the Carlisle section would have caused. Buttits notwell to forget that the danger has been escaped only upon condition that the fatal section is defeated. If Congress or the President is led to believe that disas'er has been and can be averted by any action of the Treasury Department, so that the pending bill can now be passed without causing a great calamity, the consequences of that error may be incalculaby disastrons. Let the situation be fully understood."

And here is what one of the only three Republicans who supported the pending bill, Senator Plumb, of our own State, has to say about it:

"I am a national-bank president, so I can speak without prejudice. I tell you the crisis has come when we shall see whether the banks run the Government to the Government the Bonks. I think the Government has a right to fix the rate of interest it will pay, and it is no business of any set of men, I tmakes no difference to the people if Wall street gamblers do lose money, or railroad stocks stop rising. It would make a difference if the hoes in Western cornicleds should stop, and it is with the producers that the prosuperity of the country rests. Let the bottom fall out of it if it will. It is an artificial movement to coerce the Government."

And here is something from another well-known gentleman, the oldest Republican member of the House, "Pig Iron Kelley," of Pennsylvania. He was also one of the four or five Representatives that supported the bill in the House—the member from the First Kansas district voted with him.

Hear him:
"Judge Kelley, of the Ways and Means Committee, was very "Judge Kelley, of the Ways and Means Committee, was very severe on the banks, declaring it was an effort on their part to do what the old Government Bank attempted to do many years ago, and which resulted in its overthrow, namely, to take the Government by the throat. The national banks had attempted this same thing, and precipitated a panie in the market when the Government proposed to make silver money according to law. The present infernal scheme to buildoze Congress, together with the country. It was clearly an attempt to force upon Congress submission to the domination of the banks. Judge Kelley believed the result would be to array the people against the banks, and intensify the prejutice already existing against them, and felt that an honest effort to carry out the provisions of the law instead of combining against it in this manner, would have given the banks more sympathy among the people."

[Topeka Capital, 4th.]

[Topeka Capital, 4th.]

[Topeka Capital, 4th.]

The country recognizes the contest as one between the national banks and the Government, and this veto gives the victory to the banks, and while the organs or Wall street may proclaim it the greatest act of President Hayes's Administration, there are many Republicans, especially throughout the West, who will accept the result as a vindication of the power of the banks over the Government. * *

"Money, when it can not find paying stocks and bonds, turns to the development of lands and manufacturing interests. Another particular gain to the whole country, and especially to the West would have arisen in the depressing influence this legislation would have had upon interest. No greater im ediment exists to-day in the West to its rapid development than the high rate of finterest."

Impediment exists to-day in the West to its rapid development than the high rate of interest."

Following is President Hayes's veto of the funding bill at the dictation of the national banks and President Gartield:

"I should not deem it my duty to interpose any constitutional objection to the passage of the present bill if it did not contain in its lifth section a provision which in my judgment seriously affects the value and tends to the destruction of the present national banking system of the country. * * B In short. I can not but regard the fifth section of the bill as a step in the direction of destruction of the present national banking system. * * B Beleving that a measure for refunding the national debt is not necessarily connected with national banking law, and that the refunding act will defeat its own object if it imperils national banking system or seriously impair its usefulness and confidence, and that section 5 of the bill before me would, it should become a law, work great harm, I herewith return the bill to the House of Representatives for that further consideration which is provided for in the Constitution.

"RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

"RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1881."

The fourth attempt was made in 1893. In each attempt the same methods were employed which are employed now, only at the present time they are in a more aggravated form.

What is the object to be accomplished by this fourth attempt? Why has the country been thrown into this distress? It is to put the United States on a single gold standard for the purpose of enhancing the obligation of contracts; for the purpose of enriching the creditor and impoverishing the debtor.

Look for a moment at the situation. The United States owes $30,000,000,000 to be paid in wheat and cotton and other farm products, and in manufactured articles to be paid from the products of the country. Can it not be seen in a moment what a vast interest there is in enhancing the value of the money, and what a difference it makes to the wheat-growers whether they shall sell their wheat for 50 cents or 60 cents or $1.20 a bushel, or how much difference it makes to the cotton-growers whether they are compelled to sell their cotton for 7 cents or 14 cents a pound in paying this $30,000,000,000.

If prices can be reduced still further it will take more of the wages of labor to pay debts. If you reduce the country to a gold standard there will be a perpetual shrinkage. The output of gold is now consumed in the arts: no new gold money of any consequence can be obtained; and at least one-third of the product sequence can be obtained; and at least one-third of the product is obtained from silver mines which is cut off; so that with a shrinking supply of gold and with a growing population, prices measured by gold must continue to decline, and it will make a good deal of difference to the farmer in the payment of his debts if he has to sell his wheat for 30 cents a bushel instead of $1.20. Turn back to the money famine which existed prior to the discovery of rold and silver in the New World. Then the price of covery of gold and silver in the New World. Then the price of wheat varied between 12 and 30 cents a bushel. It would take but a few years for us to go back to that same point if we were under a gold standard alone, and we should be in the same position the world was when the mines failed in other periods of his-

Then, I say, it is very important, and the creditor classes regard it as very important for themselves. They have made most vigorous efforts, and we have on the statute books but one law which recognizes silver as money, and that is the act known as the Sherman law.

Bimetallism, as I have often said, is the right to use either metal. When the entire demand falls upon the cheaper metal, the metal most easily obtained, there will be a rise in the price of that metal. As the price depends upon the demand, one rises to an equilibrium with the other. That is why the two metals have been kept along at a parity through all the ages. The demand in Europe is on gold alone. Germany put down the price of silver and raised the price of gold by selling silver and buying

Now, it is certain that if we shall stop using silver and buy gold it will put down the prices of commodities, increase the load of debts, compel the planter to sell his cotton cheaper and cheaper every year, and compel the laborer to work for less wages. That is the history of the world. That is the issue. The law of 1890 is the distory of the world. That is the issue. The law of look is the only law that is left in this country which prevents us from being absolutely a financial colony of Great Britain; and Great Britain is very anxious that that law should be destroyed.

I regret that the administration of the Treasury Department

I regret that the administration of the Treasury Department has become revolutionary. I want to call attention to that. It is now proposed to follow the bad example which has been set, revolutionize the Senate, and break down the only safeguard which has protected liberty in this country. It is pertinent to inquire, then, for what purpose, and whether a violent revolution is not already in progress, which the Senate should check before it proceeds farther? We were called together to repeal the Sherman act, but that act has been abrogated. The Secretary of the Treasury holds that by making counter offers for alltary of the Treasury holds that by making counter offers for silver bullion at the price at which he can buy he can excuse himself from buying any, because if he can bid below what anybody else will sell for, he need buy no bullion at all. That he considers to be the market price.

If he can do that, there is no doubt that he need not buy any and he can thus abrogate that law, although the President in his proclamation calling Congress together gave as a reason for its repeal that it was an imperative law, a mandatory law, and must be executed until it was repealed by Congress. Notwithstanding that statement is in the President's call, and notwithstanding similar language occurs three or four times in the President's message, still that law is abrogated.

Is it the purpose to abrogate the Sherman law? When was that purpose first conceived? When did the Treasury Department first undertake to revolutionize this Government and delaw that it was abrogated by the research by the resea clare that it would not be governed by law?

It is interesting to know where and when the scheme was devised to place the will of the Department above Congress and above law. Ah, when this country ceases to be a country governed by law, that is the end of liberty; when it comes to be governed by the caprice and passions of men, when they are permitted to govern according to their views, then liberty is dethroned. All our rights and everything we hold in this country we hold under the sanction of law, which we are all compelled to obey.

I have been astonished to read what I find in the report of the Herschell commission, appointed to inquire into the coinage of silver in India, and I blush for my country that such testimony should be given by men high in authority, that a peer of Great Britain could give the testimony I am about to read with regard to our position, and particularly that such testimony as this should be approved by the action of our Secretary of the Treasury. I call the particular attention of the Senate and the country to the testimony I am about to read. It think it such to bring ury. I call the particular attention of the senate and the country to the testimony I am about to read. I think it ought to bring the the blush of shame to the face of every lover of liberty in this country. I will read from Sir Reginald Welby, a witness:

2177. SIR REGINALD WELBY. What you have been giving us up to the present are notes for which the Government are responsible?—Yes, but the national bank notes have been comparatively stationary at about the figure of 80,000,000L for two years.

In this connection I would say that Sir Reginald Welby had given a long history of our financial legislation, very similar to that given by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], stating the kinds of money we had issued, and how they were payable. He has shown great research into the details of our financial condi-tion and his testimony covers many pages of this report. He was asked by the chairman:

was asked by the Chairman.

2170. Chairman. Have you already given us the figures you have prepared showing during the last few months that the gold and gold certificates had diminished peri passuf—Yes, I have stated them; that they seem to have been diminishing peri passuf but these figures will appear in the tables which I shall leave with you.

2180. Are you aware of any declarations made by the Secretary of the Treasury notes would, if necessary, be paid in gold?—Of course. I have read you that passage from the Treasury, be paid in gold?—Of course. I have read you that passage from the Treasury, be paid in gold?—Of course was, but there was a very important declaration made by Mr. Foster, the Secretary of the Treasury, at the annual banquet of the New York Chamber of Commerce on the 18th November, 1891, which is referred to by Mr. Taussig in his book on the sliver question, as pledging the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect.

But I have got the exact passage, and I propose to leave the whole of it with you, and I shall read what appears to be the critical part for this purpose. "Mr. Smith asked Mr. Foster to define his actual powers with regard to the issuing of Treasury notes for gold." It is not quite a clear expression of what the question was, but the Secretary replied: "The resumption act confers authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to any extent that he may be called upon to do, and to increase, maintain, or decrease his gold reserve. The act of July 14, 1890"—that is the act of 1890 we have been speaking of—"commands me to preserve the parity of gold and aliver. It has always been the custom in this country to pay obligations in gold, and therefore, should there be any trouble about this, and if the present hundred millions of gold or the reserve fund were to be called out or entrenched upon it would be within the Secretary's power to issue bonds for gold up to 5 per cent "—5 per cent interest on the bonds—"and to replace or increase that reserve fund." Of course this is a declaration that all the part would be payable in gold; he interprets that declaration in the act of 1890, which I read to you, as a direction to maintain the parity between gold and silver.

2181. It could hardly be relied on as a pledge to do that, because he might consider that the parity might be maintained without it:—Mr. Taussig an American authority, accepts it as having that construction, and that practically is the construction put upon it, and that is the object with which the declaration is made. It was a deliberate statement to the chamber of com-tically is the construction put upon it, and that is the object with which the declaration is made. It was a deliberate statement to the chamber of commerce.

2182. Mr. Courtney. What report do you quote?—I quote from the leiegram in the Times; the actual words of it telegraphed in full.

2183. I suppose Mr. Foster scarcely pledged himself to that telegram in you will see better, perhaps, when you read the whole passage; but that was the construction put upon it.

2184. CHAIRMAN. The question to which it is an answer could hardly have been telegraphed correctly?—No, it is not very clear; but still that is an historical declaration upon which that construction has been put.

2185. Of course a good deal of it would depend upon what he meant by the obligation to pay I a gold. When he speaks of the one hundred million being intrenched upon, it clooks as though he might be referring to the greenbacks?—Undoubtedly, in all the circumstances of the time, the meaning of the declaration was that all the paper would be payable in gold. If required. I happened to know there was a great deal of commotion in the United States at the time on the subject, and that construction was put upon the declaration and is put upon it. It may be interesting to mention that, when I was getting these specimens of paper which I have shown you, the gentleman at the exchange office who was selling them to me, when he gave me the bank note and when he gave me the greenback—I had been asking particularly for the gold certificates—explained to me that "these will do quite as well, sir, these are all payable in gold; it is not so expressed on the face of them, but these are all payable in gold; it is not so expressed on the face of them, but these are all the same."

2183. Mr. COURTNEY. But all these declarations of this ministerial office who is a gold. A doubt had arisen as to whether the principal was payable in continuous there was no doubt about the interest, a point ultimately settled by enactment; but for a time the credit of the bonds res

That was the administration of the Secretary of the Treasury after Mr. Foster had gone out of power.

2188. Sir REGINALD WELBY. One Secretary of the Treasury died immediately after making the declaration?—That was Windom who died. I am merely telling you how the thing stands, and Americans calmiy tell meauthorities with whom I have discussed this matter—that, law or no law, the intention is to maintain the equality with gold and to suspend the purchase of silver if necessary: that they have no hesitation about it; that that is the permanent policy of the Treasury, and account is taken of it—I mean the banks act upon it.

That statement has gone forth, and the English cabinet were assured that, law or no law, the silver-purchasing act would be suspended.

2180. CHAIRMAN. The mode which he there suggests is not the stopping of the purchases of silver or the issue of Treasury notes, but the borrowing on bonds?—I may say that, as far as my own judgment goes, the statement that he is prepared to borrow upon bonds and get gold does not bear upon the critical point. The critical point is that he should look up the paper and not issue it if it is not wanted.

The critical point was that the Secretary of the Treasury should look up the paper and not issue it if it was not wanted, that he should not issue Treasury notes, and should stop the purchase of silver bullion.

However, that is the mode in which the subject is viewed by the American public, and that is the historical declaration which has been considered one of great importance.

2190. I think that covers all that you wish to say?—That was all that I proposed to put before you. The witness withdrew

Here comes a peer of the realm and says that he is informed by the authorities here that, law or no law, the silver purchases will be stopped, and upon that declaration and that understanding the coinage of silver was suspended in India. From the testimony and reports which have come to us, there is no doubt that the suspension in India was predicated upon the anticipated action of the United States, of which the Herschell commission seem to have had knowledge. How was the knowledge obtained? The testimony I have read discloses a portion of it. There may be more in the same line.

It so happens that Mr. Bayard, who is our ambassador to Great Britain, is a gold monometallist, and of course when these assertions were made by witnesses before the commission that the Sherman act would be suspended and silver purchases would be stopped, law or no law, it is likely Mr. Bayard would be consulted so important a matter as that, because, as I have said, the action of India was predicated upon it. It was said that in anticipation of the repeal of the Sherman act the coinage in India had been suspended because there was no alternative, that silver would fall so low that it would disturb finance. The attitude of Mr. Bayard on this question is revealed by a letter written by him in July last, which I read now from the New York World of August 4, 1893. Says Mr. Bayard:

London, England, July, 1893.

I am looking somewhat anxiously to the meeting of Congress, and hope there will be no fattering in the resolve to maintain the gold unit of value. So far from depreciating the intrinsic value of silver bullion, I believe the cessation of storage and accumulation of stock will help the market price for this commodity, as it would help any other commodity.

He believes that cutting off the market, that the suspension of the purchase of 54,000,000 ounces of silver per annum would help the market, that the price of silver bullion would be advanced as would that of "any other commodity." Would the enting off of the market for more than one-third of the wheat or cotton crops enhance the price of wheat or cotton in the markets of the world? He says he believes it would "help the worlds are for this commodity as it would bely any other market soft he world. He says he believes it would help any other commodity;" that cutting off three-fifths of the whole output, if we have the correct statistics, will enhance the market price! That is strange philosophy, but it is the philosophy to which the gold men are driven at every turn. The laws of economics must, as well as the laws of commerce, of common sense, and of reason, be disregarded to reach the goal of the gold monopoly and reduce the people of the United States to serfdom. Bayard continues:

Bayard continues:

Whatever future steps may be taken, a present step ending the purchase of silver bullion under the Sherman act is of the plainest duty and necessity. Green spectacles put upon a donkey are reported to have induced him to eat shavings instead of grass, but it was not a sustaining diet.

The old gentleman is getting sarcastic—"green spectacles put on a donkey are reported to have induced him to eat shavings instead of grass, but it was not a sustaining diet." I think if two-fifths of all the markets for wheat and cotton are cut off, it would not be a sustaining diet for the producers of these comwould not be a sustaining diet for the producers of these commodities.

The intrinsic value of gold makes it the best standard and measure of the unit for the calculation of exchanges, and to unship it is simply to throw the whole machinery of civilized contract out of gear, to bring about contusion and disaster, and strike a blow at all obligations of morality and good faith, which are the corner stone of honest life.

He says, "The intrinsic value of gold makes it the best standard." He still bows down to that exploded idea of "intrinsic value." Mr. Bayard evidently has not read the elements of political economy, or he would know that the value did not reside in the thing, but in the estimation in which it was held. So far as intrinsic value is concerned, the value of gold would remain unchangeable even although all the rocks were gold; if value is intrinsic it would be the same, because the intrinsic qualities of gold have never changed and will probably never change until this world ceases to exist.

What a cry would go up if the pound avoirdupois were reduced to 10 ounces and contracts executed at that rate! Speculators are not needed to guide men in such paths and no sophistry should be permitted to obscure plain duty.

"What a cry would go up if the pound avoirdupois were reduced to 10 ounces and contracts executed at that rate." a cry ought to go up if the gold dollar has been increased 50 per cent and contracts accordingly increased.

The gold men seem to be ignorant of the first principles of political economy. They are so recreant to the rights of the masses, so greedy to add to the wealth of the classes, so greedy to change this form of government, so greedy to double the obligations of contracts, so greedy to absorb all existing rights that they ignore all sound principles of finance and try to place as absolutely on the single gold standard. There is not wealth us absolutely on the single gold standard. There is not wealth enough on the gold standard to pay the interest on the obligations already in existence. Even if you are not in debt, your country is, and you have to pay taxes, but the bondholders pay no taxes; the bondholders bear no portion of the burden. The bonds of the United States are exempt from taxes and the bonds of railroads are principally held in other lands, where they can not be reached by our laws, or they are held in various States, where they can not be reached. They are hidden away. The burden falls upon those who have visible property. It falls upon the little home of the laboring man, it falls upon the farmer, it falls upon the enterprising man who has created wealth by his skill and by his investments, and the class who own this vast accumulated indebtedness bear no portion of the burden which is augmented day by day by reducing the money with which itshall be paid, and thus increasing the struggle of the debtors to obtain money with which to discharge these obligations.

I tell you, Mr. President, the contest is upon the helpless masses of mankind, who are now in the hands of their creditors, and the $30,000,000,000 which the people of the United States owe is an enormous burden, and there must be added to that the obligation to pay taxes to carry on the Government, and the owners of homes must pay.

If gold alone is to be the standard, if silver is to be destroyed, let no man content himself with the idea that he can escape from the losses which will result. His property is mortgaged to may the obligations of the Government. The railroads with to pay the obligations of the Government. The railroads with $5,000,000,000 of stock and $5,000,000,000 more of bonds are a mortgage upon every man who moves; they are a mortgage on every man who travels; they are a mortgage on the labor of every man who produces an article of commerce. Here are the obligations of your local government, State governments, and National Government, all a mortgage upon your property. Do you not want to discharge that mortgage in the money of the contract? Do you want that mortgage enlarged by a policy being adopted which will make it more difficult for you to get the money with which to pay your taxes?

Do you not know when money becomes scarce, like all other articles, it becomes dear, and that when you enhance that mortgage you increase the power and control of the classes over the masses? Do you not know that this is the struggle which has been going on in Great Britain for ages? Do you not know that a consideration of what has occurred would lead any sensible man to the conclusion that there was cooperation between our officials and the officials of Great Britain to strike down free coinage in India and silver purchases in the United States? Do you not believe that Mr. Bayard, our ambassador to Great Britain, would advocate the reduction of the world to the gold standard, and that, if his advice were asked, he would advise the suspension of coinage in India? Can it be doubted that it was his purpose to reduce everything to he gold standard when he siys so?

Can it be doubted that he believed that gold should be the only standard when he works to that end? Can it be doubted that this Government has cooperated with Great Britain for the last twenty years to bring about the sud result we now see, in view of the fact that it was the United States and Great Britain at the fatal conference of 1867 in Paris, which secured the assent of nineteen nations to the adoption of the gold standard? Can it be doubted that those high in office in this country, whether publicly or not, have continually cooperated with the gold monopoly to destroy silver?

Why, then, talk about an international conference? Why talk about waiting until Great Britain consents to a bimetallic standard when high officials of this country have for twenty years cooperated with the monometallic administration of Great Britain to bring about the sad results which we now see, to relegate the people of this country to the position of a British colony financially, to make us the subjects of Great Britain so far as our finances are concerned? When you have done that, you have

I stid that there had been four great occasions when bankers and the money power generally had attempted to stampede Con-gress. The first was 1811, when the United States Bank charter was about to expire. A panic was created by that bank curtailing credits, bringing on a squeeze, as it was graphically suggested in an interview attributed to President Cleveland. They brought on a squeeze then, and when the bank got so rotten that the necessities of the occasion and the good sense of the President would endure it no longer, when he believed that the Gov-ernment money was not safe, that the bank was used for political purposes, he ordered his Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the Covernment funds elsewhere and make them safe.

Then came a struggle which will be ever memorable in the history of this country, and, as time rolls on, the record of that man who stood by the people will grow brighter and brighter. I know he had against him the greatest intellects of that age, and probably of any age in American history; that he had against him the great Clay, the immortal Webster, and Calhoun, a trio which were brought together to defend and protect this bank, but the people stood by Andrew Jackson and revere his memory to-day. I can not refrain on this occasion from calling attention to-day. I can not refrain on this occasion from calling attention to that great struggle. I read from Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 373:

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS FROM THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

The fact of this removal was communicated to Congress in the annual message of the President; the reasons for it, and the mode of doing it, were reserved for a separate communication; and especially a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom belonged the absolute right of the removal, without assignment of any reasons except to Congress after the act

Secretary of the Treasury, to whom belonged the absolute right of the removal, without assignment of any reasons except to Congress after the act was done.

The order for the removal, as it was called—for it was only an order to the collectors of revenue to cease making their deposits in that bank, leaving the amount actually in it, to be drawn out at intervals, and in different sums according to the course of the Government disbursements—was issued the 22d of September, and signed by Roger B. Taney, esq., the new Secretary of the Treasury, appointed in place of Mr. William J. Duane, who, refusing to make the removal upon the request of the President, was himself removed.

This measure (the ceasing to deposit the public moneys with the Bank of the United States) was the President's own measure, conceived by him, carried out by him, defended by him, and its fate dependent upon him. He had coadjutors in every part of the business, but the measure was his own: for this heroic civil measure, like a heroic military resolve, had to be the off-spring of one great mind—esli acting and poised—seeing its way through all difficulties and dangers; and discerning ultimate triumph over all obstacles in the determination to conquer them or to perish.

Councils are good for safety, not for heroism; good for escapes from perils, and for retreats, but for action, and especially high and daring action, but one mind is wanted. The removal of the deposits was an act of that kind. High and daring, and requiring as much nerve as any enterprise of arms in which the President had ever been engaged. His military exploits had been of his own conception; his great civil acts were to be the same; more impeded than promoted by councils. And thus it was in this case.

The majority of his Cabinet was against him. His Secretary of the Treasury refused to execute his will. A few only—a fraction of the Cabinet and some friends—concurred heartily in the act. Mr. Taney, Attorney-General; Mr. Kendali, Mr. Francis P. Blair, editor of the Globe; and Observation had only confirmed his opinion, communicated to the previous Congress, of the misconduct of the institution and the insecurity of the public moneys in it: and the almost unanimous vote of the House of Representatives to the contrary made no impression upon his strong conviction. Defining a legislative examination into its affairs, he determined upon an executive one through inquiries put to the Government directors and the researches into the state of the books, which the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to make.

Four of those directors, namely, Messrs, Henry D. Gilpin, John T. Sulfvan, Peter Wager, and Hugh McEldery, made two reports to the President, according to the duty assigned them, in which they showed great misconduct in its management and a great perversion of its funds to undue and political purposes. Some extracts from these reports will show the nature of this report, the names of persons to whom money was paid being omitted, as the only object in making the extracts is to show the conduct of the bank, and not to disturb or affect any individuals."

Then comes a list of expenditures, amounting to $80,000 for

Then comes a list of expenditures, amounting to $80,000 for political purposes, which I shall not read.

Pointical purposes, which I shall not read.

These various items, amounting to about $80,000, all explain themselves by their names and dates—every name of an item referring to a political purpose, and every date corresponding with the impending questions of the recharter and the Presidential election; and all charged to the expense account of the bank—a head of account limited, by the nature of the institution, so far as printing was concerned, to the printing necessary for the conducting of its own business; yet in the whole sum making the total of $80,000, there is not an item of that kind included. To expose or correct these abuses the Government directors submitted the following resolution to the board.

This appeared upon the books of the bank. The $80,000 spent purely for political purposes, squeezes, bribery, and the advantage taken of the public loans made to influence Congress are not included in these items. Those extensions of time and the facilities granted by this bank to bring pressure upon Congress and upon the President are not among the items enumerated. They appeared upon the books of the bank, in plain violation of its charter. Of course the president had a right to become alarmed. A majority of the Government directors had been excluded from the meetings. There was a cabal inside, which was made by the president of the bank. He could take anybody in he pleased; he had that discretion under the resolution, but the Government directors were excluded from participation in these discussions as to the policy of the bank. The Government directors then presented this resolution:

presented this resolution:

Whereas it appears by the expense account of the bank for the years 1831 and 1832, that upwards of $80,000 were expended and charged under the head of stationery and printing during that period; that a large proportion of this sum was paid to proprietors of newspapers and periodical journais, and for the printing, distribution, and postage of immense numbers of pamphlets and newspapers; and that about $20,000 were expended under the resolutions of 30th November, 1830, and 11th March, 1831, without any account of the manner in which, or the persons to whom, they were disbursed; and Whereas it is expedient and proper that the particulars of this expenditure, so large and unusual, which can now be ascertained only by the examination of numerous bills and receipts, should be so stated as to be readily submitted to, and examined by, the board of directors and the stockholders: Therefore.

*Resolved, That the cashier furnish to the board, at as early a day as possible, a full and particular statement of all these expenditures, designating the sums of money paid to each person, the quantity and names of the documents furnished by him; and his charges for the distribution and postage of the same, together with as full a statement as may be of the expenditures under the resolutions of 30th of November, 1830, and 11th March, 1831. That he ascertain whether expenditures of the same character have been made at any of the offices, and if so, procure similar statements thereof, with the authority on which they were made; that the said resolutions be rescinded, and no further expenditures made under the same.

That resolution was rejected by the board, and, in place of it, another was adopted, declaring perfect confidence in the president of the bank, who was carrying on the business. No inquiry could be had.

President Jackson goes on and shows vast expenditures which were unwarranted and irregular, in his opinion. The bank when it came to be wound up made a very peculiar showing. I wish to call attention to the way the thing looked when the bank was wound up, when over a million of dollars could not be accounted for, and the names of the parties to whom it was given were not made known:

It is known that measures have been taken to rescue the property of this shattered institution from impending peril and to recover as much as possible of those enormous bounties which it was conceded had been paid by its late managers to trading politicians and mercenary publishers for corrupt services rendered to it during its charter-seeking and electioneering cambridges.

services rendered to it during its charter-seeking and electioneering campaigns.

3. The amount of the suit instituted by the Bank of the United States against Mr. N. Biddle is $1,018,000, paid out during his administration, for which no vouchers can be found.

4. The United States Bank is a perfect wreck and is seemingly the prey of the officers and their friends, who are making away with its choicest assets by selling them to each other and taking pay in the depreciated paper of the South.

5. Besides its own stock of $35,000,000, which is sunk, the bank carries down with it a great many other institutions and companies, involving a loss of about $21,000,000 more, making a loss of $36,000,000, besides injuries to indi-

I want to call attention to proceedings similar to those which are occurring to-day:

From the moment of the removal of the deposits, it was seen that the plan of the bank of the United States was to force their return, and with it a repewal of its charter, by operating on the business of the country and the clarms of the people. For this purpose, loans and accommodations were to cease at the mother bank and all its branches, and in all the local banks over which the national bank had control—

That is precisely what was done last spring; loans ceased every. where. It was the same old method, the same squeeze by which the Denver banks were broken. It is the old trick, the old enemy, we are meeting now.

And at the same time that discounts were stopped, curtailments were made; and all business men called on for the payment of all they owed, at the same time that all the usual sources of supply were stopped. This pressure was made to fall upon the business community, especially upon large establishments employing a great many operatives; so as to throw as many laboring people as possible out of employment.

We have the same old thing repeated again, and as many laboring people as possible have been thrown out of employment. They said then that the only relief to be had is to demonetize silver. They said then that the only relief that could be had was to let that national bank go on. It is the same thing, it is to accomplish the same kind of wicked purpose; what is being done to day was done then.

At the same time politicians engaged in making panic had what amounts they pleased, an instance of a loan of $100,000 to a single one of these agitators being detected—

Hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid to men engaged in agitation. They were paid what money the bank pleased, and there is an instance of \$100,000 being paid to a single agitator, who was detected-and a loan of \$1,100,000 to a broker, employed in making distress, and in relieving it in favored cases at a usury of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per month.

Here we have a broker who made over a million dollars in New York by relieving this "distress" by loaning currency at a premium. The same business goes on now, the same old thing.

In this manner the business community was oppressed, and in all parts of the Union at the same time, the organization of the national bank, with branches in every State and its control over local banks, being sufficient to enable it to have its policy carried into effect in all places and at the same

We witness the same thing to-day. We have some 3,500 national banks in existence in this country to-day, and the old Bank of the United States had branches in all the States. Now the national banks are in every State conducting this same business.

The first step in this policy was to get up distress meetings-

The same thing has been done here. We have had distress meetings of the chambers of commerce and all sorts of distress statements that they could get up in the attempt to show distress among the business men—a thing easily done.

And then to have these meetings properly officered and conducted. Men who had voted for Jackson, but now renounced him were procured for president, vice-president, secretaries, and orators; distress orations were delivered.

As they are to-day-and after sufficient exercise in that way, a memorial and a set of resolves, prepared for the occasion, were presented and adopted.

The same old plan.

After adoption, the old way of sending by the mail was discarded and a deptation selected to proceed to Washington and make delivery of their lugubrious document.

Here they came to Washington themselves with their distresings statements.

These memorials generally came in duplicate, to be presented in both Houses at once, by a Senator from the State and the Representative from the district. These, on presenting the petition, delivered a distress harangue on its contents, often supported by two or three adjunct speakers, although there was a rule to forbid anything being said on such occasions, except to make a brief statement of the contents. Now they were read in violation of the rule and spoken upon in violation of the rule and printed never to be read again, and referred to a committee, never more to be seen by it; and bound up in volumes to encumber the shelves of the public documents.

Every morning for three months the presentation of these memorials, with speeches to enforce them, was the occupation of each House, all the memorials bearing the impress of the same mint, and the orations generally cast after the same pattern. These harangues generally gave, in the first place, some topographical or historical notice of the county or town from which it came—sometimes with a hint of its revolutionary services—then a description of the felicity which it enjoyed while the bank had the deposits; then the ruin which came upon it, at their loss, winding up usually with a great quantity of indignation against the man whose illegal and cruel conduct had occasioned such destruction upon their business.

The meetings were sometimes held by young men; sometimes by old men; sometimes by the laboring, sometimes by the mercantile class; sometimes miscellaneous, and irrespective of party; and usually sprinkled over with a smart number of former Jackson men, who had abjured him on account of his conduct to the bank. Some passages will be given from a few of these speeches.

Then Mr. Benton gives some of the speeches, and these speeches are much more terrific than anything we have heard here about the alarming condition of the country. Mr. Benton made a reply to these speeches, a portion of which I shall read. He comments in this way:

Mer. Benton replied to these distress petitions, and distress harangues, by showing that they were nothing but a reproduction, with a change of names and dates, of the same kind of speeches and petitions which were heard in the year 1811, when the charter of the first national bank was expiring, and when General Jackson was not President, when Mr. Taney was not Secretary of the Treasury, when no deposits had been removed, and when there was no quarrel between the bank and the Government, and he read copiously from the Congress debates of that day to justify what he sadi; and declared the two scenes, so far as the distress was concerned, to be identical.

All the cases so far as distress was concerned are identical. The distress is created by the action of the banks causing a scare, and refusing to perform their ordinary functions. That is the way distress was created then, and the way distress is created

After reading from these petitions and speeches, he proceeded to say:

"All the machinery of alarm and distress was in as full activity at that time as at present, and with the same identical effects—town meetings, memorials, resolutions, deputations to Congress, alarming speeches in Congress. The price of all property was shown to be depressed. Hemp sunk in Philadelphia from $50 to $50 per ton; flour sunk from $11 a barrel to $7.75; and the read of money rose to one and a half per month on the best paper, confidence destroyed; manufactories stopped; workmen dismissed, and the ruln of the country confidently predicted.

"This was the scene then; and for what object? Purely and simply to obtain a recharter of the bank—purely and simply to force a recharter from the alarm and distress of the country; for there was no r moval of deposits then to be complained of, and to be made the scapegoat of a studied and premeditated attempt to operate upon Congress through the alarms of the people and the destruction of their property. There was not even a curtailment of discounts then. The whole scene was fictitious; but it was a case in which fiction does the mischief of truth. A false alarm in the money market produces all the effects of real danger; and thus, as much distress was proved to exist, and really did exist—then as now; without a single cause to be alleged then which is alleged now. But the power and organization of the bank made the alarm then; its power and organization make it now; and fictitious on both occasions; and men were rulned then, as now, by the power of imaginary danger, which in the moneyed would has all the rulnous effects of real danger.

No deposits were removed then and the reason was as assigned by Mr.

both occasions; and men were runed then, as now, by the power of imaginary anger, which in the moneyed would has all the rulnous effects of real danger.

No deposits were removed then and the reason was as assigned by Mr. Gallatin to Congress, that the Government had borrowed more than the amount of the deposits from the bank; and this loan would enable her to protect her interest in every contingency. The open object of the bank then was a recharter. The knights entered the lists with their visors off—no was not distinguise then for the renewal of a charter under the tilting and jousting of a masquerade scume for recovery of deposits.

This was a complete reply, to which no one could make any answer; and the two distresses all proved the same thing, that a powerful national bank could make distress when it pleased; and would always please to doit when it had an object to gain by it—either in forcing a recharter or in reaping a harvest of profit by making a contraction of debts after having made an expansion of credits.

It will be difficult for people in after times to realize the degree of excitement, of agitation, and commotion which was produced by this organized attempt to make panic and distress. The great cities especially were tisseene of commotion but little short of frenzy—public meetings of thousands, the most inflammatory harangues, cannon firing, great feasts—and the members of Congress who spoke against the President received when they traveled with public honors like conquering generals returning from victorious battlefields; met by masses, saluted with acclamations, escorted by processions, and their lodgings surrounded by thousands calling for a view of their persons. The gaining of a municipal election in the city of New York put the climax upon this enthusiasm; and some instances taken from the every-day occurrences of the time may give some faint idea of this extravagant exaltation.

The condition of the bank was such when it finally wound up and went into bankruptcy that over a million dollars of its assets could not be accounted for, and it dared not account for them and give the names of the parties who drew the money

But in all the excitement, in all the harangues which were indulged in then, there was nothing approximating what is occurring now. We not only have the testimony before the Herschell commission that the officers of our Government would buy no more silver, law or no law; we not only have here the action of the Treasury Department defying the law, but we have a member of that same party, a subordinate of the Secretary of the Treasury, making a speech in Chicago yesterday, the most remarkable which has been made by any official in any land under any circumstances. der any circumstances.

There was a gathering of bankers in Chicago yesterday, which was addressed by several gentlemen, among others Mr. Eckels, the Comptroller of the Currency, and if his address does not indicate the temper of the times more graphically than anything I have seen in any one address, I am at a loss to know what can illustrate it. Mr. Eckels said—I read from the Washington Post of this morning, October 19:

It may be that bankers are selfish: but not more so. I venture, than men in other walks of life. Surely not more so than the silver interests, which to-day inveigh the most loudly against them, and yet with an inconsist ency so marked that "he who runs may read" are, with selfish indifference to the public good, not only blocking the wheels of legislation at Washington, but, unmindful of the voice of the people and of the press, are making the fundamental principle of our Government, the right of the majority to control, "a hissing and by word" that their own selfish purposes may find fruition in legislative enactment that will compel the Government to be the special patron of their special product.

That rewards is made by a Redownlowing He court the miner.

That remark is made by a Federal official. He says the minor ity of the Senate, the silver men, are unmindful of the voice of the people.

Now, Mr. President, I did not suppose that any official of the Government would ever use such language towards the legislative department. In the first place, what right had he to critical of the control of the contr cise the proceedings here? It is becoming too popular on the part of the executive department to lecture Congress, a department that has abrogated a law that was declared to be mandatory, a department that has ceased to purchase silver, law or no law. Is such language as this to come from the executive department? Mr. Eckels alludes to the selfishness and the wickedness of the minority, and attributes to us an unworthy motive, attempting to make the Government a patron to purchase a commodity produced by us. I deny the whole charge. The charge is false; the charge is infamous: there is no ground for the

No Senator has asked the Government to buy silver. We have protested against the purchase of silver from the beginning. We have demanded the right guaranteed by the Constitution to take our silver to the mint and have it coined. We charge that the gold men have taken from us that right, and that they gave us no hearing, but did it by a conspiracy with the gold monometallists of Great Britain and the creditor class. They struck it down when we knew not of it.

We developed an empire; we found mines; we made it possible for this Government to be rich and great; we made it possible for this people to mine and coin their own money; we made it possible for them to be independent of debt; we made it possible for America to be the financial center of the world. We found mines of gold and silver, and laid a foundation for an em-We invested our all on the supposed good faith of our Government. We have been betrayed. Our mines are closed; our people are starving. Why were we betrayed? For the purpose of enabling the gold kings to enslave the producing classes of this country. Why are they to be enslaved? For the purpose of reducing the prices of commodities, so that the producing must him on a transition prices for the purpose. ducers must live on strivation prices; for the purpose of enhancing the value of bonds; for the purpose of changing our form of civilization.

We have protested against American slavery; we have protested against British rule here, and for this we are called self-ish. But this officer of the Government does not allude to an-He does not allude to the men in the Senate who have bonds; he does not allude to the men in the Senate who have bank stock, who propose to vote for a bill that donates to them $20,000,000 without their doing a thing. No allusion is made to that. I claim that every industry in which there is competition ought to be represented in the Senate. The cotton industry ought to be represented here; the wheat interest ought to be represented here; the manufacturing interest ought to be represented here; the mining interest ought to be represented here. But I deny that the Senate should be a manufacturing shop of money, or that any interested party should be engaged in the manufacture of money here. This is a legislative department, and no man has a right to sit here and vote money into his own pocket. That is the distinction I make.

epel with indignation and scorn the insinuation that any man outside engaged in legitimate business has not a right to be represented here, but I deny the right of any man holding bank what is the proposition here? To destroy silver, to issue bonds, and buy gold. For what purpose? For the purpose of allowing national banks more bank circulation; to allow them to get a further subsidy from the Government; to allow them to be in a position where they can produce a panic at will; to allow them to do as they did in 1811, to create a panic at will and command legislation; to allow them as they did in 1833, to create distress everywhere; to give them an opportunity to rob the country. That is what it is for.

The present crisis is the greatest that has ever been brought upon the American people. There was never such a crisis before. This is a new order of things. In former times the bonded fore. This is a new order of things. In former times the bonded system did not exist. Now, the country is bonded, the bonds plyable in gold or silver, and the bondholders propose to make the bonds payable in gold alone. It has gone to the utmost extent of indebtedness. It was to be paid in gold and silver by the people. The people had done it, they made the contract, they must stand by it; but the cruelty of changing those contracts and making gold the only means of payment is beyond comprehension.

Now I suppose this young gentleman did not think he was doing anything illegitimate. He was undoubtedly a candidate for future honors. He saw before him the brilliant success of predecessors all along down the line where they had been taken into the arms of New York banking establishments and made rich. It may be that he thought he would ingratiate himself with those bunkers by abusing Congress. He may have an aspira-tion to become a bank president, and this kind of proceeding will undoubtedly facilitate his aspiration. This must be attributed to the language of a candidate for special favors when he goes out of office. So many graduates from the Treasury Department have obtained rich berths in New York that this young man, a young lawyer, saw the brilliant career that had been secured by others similarly situated, and the prize was too dazzling; he must turn in and abuse Congress too. He must abuse the silver miner who was starving for bread; he must extol the bankers who are robbing the world; he must speak tickling things to them and they of course would tickle him in the future as they had tickled many of his associates and predecessors.

Now, this language grows out of the condition of things; this language grows out of the contempt of high officials for the laws of Congress; this language is inspired by the greed and arrogance of the gold ring of Great Britain that tramples upon the rights of all. Perhaps I have said too harsh things of him; but I only speak of him as the representative of the controlling passion of the hour that demands us to abrogate the rules and vote and discuss afterwards.

The United States Bank ended in disgrace, but we have got a hydra-headed institution worse than that. We have one that is not supported by deposits alone, and I will have occasion to speak of those deposits sometime. It not only has the deposits of the Government, which are ten, yes a hundredfold greater than the deposits in the old Unit d States Bank, but hundreds and millions have been deposited in these concerns. They were enabled between 1876 and 1881 to make millions in purchasing United States bonds, the purchase price remaining deposited in the banks in many instances. There never were such abuses in the history of the world as the favoritism to particular banks, and on another occasion I am going to show it.

The deposits in many individual banks were greater than the entire deposit in all the banks in 1833. No complaint has been made of these deposits; the banks have had the use of them. That is not all. The banks are allowed to use the money and That is not all. The banks are allowed to use the money and draw interest at the same time. Ninety per cent of the bonds deposited with the Government are paid to the banks. They deposits 300,000 in bonds and get back 90 per cent of it to do business, and then draw interest on the hundred thousand. For many years when this institution first started it drew from the Government a subsidy, a gratuity of $15,000,000 a year besides the advantages of the deposits. No one can point out what adthe advantages of the deposits. No one can point out what advantage a national-bank note has over a greenback. The greenbacks were retired; they were funded into bonds.

The greenbacks draw no interest; they were funded into bonds and the bonds filed in the Treasury, and 90 per cent given back to do business on, and the Government charged with interest on the whole; and the Government was unjustly charged with $15,-000,000 per annum for many years. This they propose to do again. The combination between the national banks and the gold ring of London and New York are the enemies with whom we have to of London and New York are the enemies with whom we have to contend. This is proposed when we are making this struggle for the people, when we are standing here and protesting that this issue was not submitted to a vote of the people, that both political parties agreed that they were for bimetallism and both repudiated the idea that they would adopt the single standard of gold. They went before the country on that; and now at the dictation of the London syndicate we are called together here to re-peal the act, and then say that the business demands it, that the people demand it.

The people have not demanded it; it has not been submitted to them; and the gold men dare not submit it. They dare not take the verdict of the people.

take the verdict of the people.

With all the appliances of all the power given by their foreign creditors who are squeezing their debtors in this country, with all the appliances of the national banks and other institutions, who are squeezing their debtors, with all the appliances of public credit, with all the appliances of the Administration, with all the contempt of officials for law—with all these we meet in this revolutionary scheme to override the will of the people.

We are met here and demanded to surrender; and to accomplish their purpose they would wise out the landmarks remove.

the landmarks that have stood here as bulwarks of liberty through the century. They would remove the bulwarks of liberty through the extension of slavery into California and into the Northwest. They would remove the bulwarks of liberty that prevented the Executive from seizing the local elections and making this a monarchy. They would remove all the bulwarks of liberty and ride roughshod over the people and subject them to slavery in the name of constitutional liberty.

Why, rules were made to check the madness of the majority under just such circumstances as these? If there was any patri-otism in the Senate, if the fire of liberty breathed here, it seems to me that a majority of the Senate would be indignant at the trampling of the law by the Executive; they would be indignant that Congress should be called here to repeal a law that the Executive had already trampled upon; and they would blush that it should be given in evidence before the high tribunal in England land, that the officers of this Government would cease to purchase silver, law or no law. They would blush. I say, that England in demonstraing silver in India had taken official action upon the assurance of our officials that the law of 1890 was to be repealed. They would blush, I say, for their country; and if the right to debate is cut off here, if it is stricken down in the house of its friends, if revolution is accomplished here, the time will come, and that speedily, when the people will have no voice in the making of their laws. They are now too poor to attend conventions

I deny it. It was well understood that when the lower House was elected there was a two-thirds majority in favor of honest money, a two-thirds majority against British rule, a two-thirds majority against the country of the country and laws of the country against the country of the country against the country of the country against the c the trampling upon the Constitution and laws of the country. two-thirds majority in favor of fair play, a two-thirds majority in fayor of the masses against the classes.

How did it become a two-thirds majority the other way? In this Hall on the last vote taken there was a large majority for free coinage. The vote last February on a measure to repeal the Sherman law was defeated by 19 majority. How this change? That was after the people had spoken. Then the Senate had repeated for the voice of the people. That was after the election of Mr. Cleveland. The Senate remained true to its colors, true to the people until the howl of distress was raised, until the appliance of 1811 and 1823 was break that the senate remained true to its colors. ances of 1811 and 1833 were brought to bear to coerce and stampede Congress. It is claimed that a majority are the other way. I do not believe it. I do not believe there is any such majority. I believe that those men who have stood for the people for the last twenty years and have made a name for the people for the last twenty years and have made a name for themselves can not, when the time comes, afford to join the enemies of the people, the enemies of mankind, and reduce the masses to slavery to enrich the few. I do not believe they can do it. They may think they can. It will be a bold man, knowing as they know, having said as many good things as they have said, who can now turn his back upon the people.

I protest against the insulting claim that the right of discus-

I procest against the insulting claim that the right of discussion has been abused on this occasion. The discussion on the part of the defenders of the people has been earnest. No time has been spent in idle talk, as we believe; and now when the discussion is under way and we are laying it before the country they become alarmed. They say they must cut off the right of debate, we must stop this giving notice, or their evil ways will be known. No man fears the truth so much as a rascal; no man fears the discussion as much as a rascal; no man fears the truth so much as a rascal; no man fear known. No man fears the truth so much as a rascal; no man fears discussion so much as he who is going to do wrong. Behind every bush is a police officer in the estimation of the transgressor. The gold men fear protracted discussion.

It is said the country is suffering on account of the Sherman act. I deny it. No man has been able to show any evil resulting from the existence of the Sherman act, and now that the act has been trampled upon it is insulting to us to command that we shall stay here to repeal it. Let those who are disobeying the law take the responsibility. Let them dare to do as the witnesses before the Herschell commission said they would do, refuse to purchase, law or no law. Let the American people underfuse to purchase, law or no law. Let the American people understand that the issue is here whether the Departments shall obey fuse to purchase, law or no law. Let the American people understand that the issue is here whether the Departments shall obey the law; whether we live under a government of law or a government of the will of a dictator. Let them go before the country. Will Congress defile its hands by sanctioning a violation of the law? That is what I ask.

The law has been trampled upon by the Executive. Let that remain. Let the American people stand squarely to the issue. Have we a government of law or a government of the uncontrolled will of an executive officer? Do not put up with this disobedience of law, when they say they will purchase no silver, law or no law. Let them face the issue which they have made between the law and the people. They have put themselves against the law. Let them stand there and do not let the Senate relieve them from the position in which they are placed by violating the usages of this body, by denying to the minority the right to discuss this momentous question. It must not and it can not be done. Why, the appeal to the Vice-President to disgrace himself, to make himself infamous through all the ages, is most outrageous. He will not do it. He is an American. He will not lay his hand upon the Constitution and the laws of his country. The rules were made for occasions like this, to protect the minority, and they will protect the minority.

It is not a good time, in my judgment, to exercise arbitrary power in the Senate. I think a more unfortunate occasion could not be seized upon by those who are anxious to pass the pending bill. I myself have been in the Senate but a short time, yet it will be noticed that I have been here as long as the gentlemen who propose these radical rules in this body. I am following in the footsteps of many illustrious Senators. They are not. There is abundant precedent for the position which I have taken. There is none for theirs.

There is none for theirs.

Senator Conkling, in 1879, moved to go into executive session, then refused to vote, and when a quorum failed to respond called attention to the fact, all the time remaining in his seat. On that occasion all the Republicans sat silent in their seats all night, thus breaking a quorum. Many similar instances have already been cited in this debate.

The Senator from Rhode Lebel 1975.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] announced the The Senator from Knode Island Mr. ALDRICH announced the other day that he undertook to bring in a proposition to change the rules during the force-bill fight. He also announced that if he could have his way he would close this debate at once, and within two days after that statement he said that there was not a majority in this Chamber in favor of the force bill and therea majority it this chamber in layor of the total theoretic fore it did not pass. Had he had his way then, you would have overturned the will of the majority of this Chamber and of the people of this country, and perhaps brought on a revolution. A stronger argument could not be made by any one for the liberal stronger argument could not be made by any one for the liberal discussion which is allowed in this Chamber under the rules. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman], for whom I have the most profound respect, I may even say affection, was careful not to take the position of these younger Senators; and no Senator who has occupied a position on this floor with credit and ability for years takes their position.

The Senator from Ohio did not go further than to say that it would be received a position of the proposition of the pr

The Senator from Ohio did not go further than to say that it would be necessary perhaps at some future time, not during this debate, to change the rules of the Senate. I differ with the distinguished Senator in that. I do not think it is necessary now, nor will it ever be necessary to change the rules of the Senate. There never has been a time from the foundation of the Government until now when the will of the people has not been registered by the Senate when that will has been clearly ascertained. Never has there been such a time, and in the future the will of the people will be registered by the Senate.

You can not frighten any one by saying that when it comes to other legislation obstructive methods can be used. You can not frighten any one by saying that tariff legislation will be prevented. After numerous debates and conventions, that question was finally submitted to the American people. The platforms of the two leading parties were in clearly defined opposition.

One of them demanded a tariff for revenue only, whilst the other demanded a tariff for protection, and the people put the party in power which contended for a tariff for revenue only. There in power which contended for a tariff for revenue only. There is not a Senator on this floor who would dare to obstruct the will of the people on this question as expressed at the polls.

There is no stronger protectionist on this floor than I am myself. I think the effect of tariff for revenue only in my part of the country would be almost as disastrous as the passage of the pending bill.

I am a Penulticum and no matter what my collecture on this

I am a Republican, and no matter what my colleagues on this side may do, they can not drive me from the ranks of the Republican party. They may destroy me in my own State, they may drive away the Republicans in that State from their party, but my convictions are strong and lasting, and I shall continue to be a Republican. But I would not obstruct for one moment the passage of a tariff bill, or any other bill on which the people have expressed themselves at the polls. I hold the interests of my State above party allegiance, and when, as in the present contention, the interests of my people are attacked by my party I shall remain true to the interests of my people even if it carries me to expression my party.

me to opposing my party.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator know of any method under the existing rules whereby the majority can pass the pending or any other bill provided twenty Senators are determined that they shall not pass it?

Mr. DUBOIS. I was coming to that in an orderly way. I will come to it now. I say that any bill which the people of this country desire passed, on which they have voted, will be passed by the Senate. Mr. HILL. How, I ask the Senator?

Mr. DUBOIS. By a vote. Mr. BILL. When?

Mr. DUBOIS. By a vote.
Mr. HILL. When?
Mr. DUBOIS. Does the Senator mean at what time, the 1st of next July or the 1st of September, or some supposititious bill that he is speaking about?
Mr. HILL. No; I am taking any bill that the majority of the Senate may desire to pass. Does the Senator know of any way or method under existing rules whereby it can be done if twenty Senators insist that it shall not be done? If so, I should like to have him point it out. I suggested yesterday that I thought I knew of a remedy. It is by an amendment of the rules. enator knows of any other remedy I should like to hear it

Senator knows of any other remedy I should like to hear it.

Mr. DUBOIS. By the same methods which have applied from the foundation of the Government. No doubt if the Senator from New York had been in this Chamber he would have insisted on the passage of the force bill. I say that on account of the sneers and taunts he hurls at distinguished Senators on his side of the Chamber who were in the rebel army, and from the attacks which he makes on their election methods in the the attacks which he makes on their election methods in the South. But the majority of the people of this country did not want the force bill passed. There was no sentiment in this country for the force bill.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me? That is the very reason why it did not pass. If the majority had wanted to pass it, undoubtedly it would have accomplished its will.

Mr. DUBOIS. The same condition of affairs exists here. While I will not contend, as I said the other day, that the people of this country have declared in favor of tree cainage. I do contend that country have declared in favor of free coinage, I do contend that overy national party and every State party in its platform de-manded a recognition of silver and a continuation of the issuance of money. The verdict of the people has been rendered and registered. Yet we are asked to come here and pass a bill which stops the issuance of money and refuses the continuous coinage of silver, contrary to their wishes. There is not and there never has been a majority of Senators on this floor in favor of unconditional repeal. The majority are in favor of some kind of a compromise

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me? Why not then pro-

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me? Why not then proceed immediately to vote and then get your victory?
Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from New York is altogether too impatient. I think that his methods have not been the methods of the Senate. I say to the Senator from New York that if the Senate had pursued its ordinary method, if It had gone along in a dignified manner and debated this question within Senatorial hours from 12 to 5 o'clock, an arrangement would have been made and the will of the majority in the Senate would have been carried out without resorting to any undignified methods on been carried out without resorting to any undignified methods on this floor. That is the way it always has been done, and it is the way it would have been done in this case.

way it would have been done in this case.

Does any one attempt to say now that he is not glad the force bill did not pass? I see sitting in front of me the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], who spoke for twelve hours against that bill, and I have it from the highest authority that he could have spoken 'welve hours more. The distinguished Senator from Muryland [Mr. Gorman] led the fight against the bill. During his honorable career in the Senate, and the long career which I hope he will have in the future, I dare say he will point with more pride to the contention which he then made as he thought for the liberty of the people of one he then made as he thought for the liberty of the people of one section of this country than to any other past of his record. Yet, could the majority have done as the Senator from New York now wants to do, and as the Senator from Rhode Island proposed to do, they would have thwarted the will of the people, and all admit four years afterwards that the minority were right.

admit four years afterwards that the minority were right.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.
Mr. HAWLEY. Not at all.
Mr. DUBOIS. Does the Senator from Connecticut say the bill ought to have passed?
Mr. HAWLEY. I do.
Mr. DUBOIS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not suppose that anyone is of that opinion now.
Mr. HAWLEY. Plenty are.
Mr. DUBOIS. I can say that at that time all the members of the Democratic party in the United States were opposed to it, and a great number of Republicans throughout the United States. I say all hall and acclaim to the Republicans on this side of the Chamber who stood up against their Administration, against Chamber who stood up against their Administration, against their President, and finally prevented that wrong; and I say all hail and acclaim to the Democrats on the other side of the Chamber who are now standing out against their Administration in order to preserve the will of the people as expressed at the polls.

I will read in this connection a short paragraph which caught my eye. It is the eulogy delivered by Charles Sumner on the occasion of the funeral ceremony over the distinguished Senator from Vermont, Jacob Collamer. Charles Sumner said:

from Vermont, Jacob Collamer. Charles Sumner shu:

Say not that I err, because here, at his funeral, seeking to do him honor, I exhibit him bravely standing face to face with executive power, wielded by a President who was instigated by Jefferson Davis, and then again, bravely standing face to face with executive power, wielded by the gentle hand of Abraham Lincoln. In the first case it was to save an outraged people: in the other case it was to vindicate the powers of the people of the United States in Congress assembled to provide guaranties and safeguards against that wickedness and perjury which had deluged his beloved country with blood.

Say not that I err, because now, at his funeral, anxious that his best actions should not be forgotten, I commemorate this championship. He is dead, but the good he has done cannot die. And hereafter faithful Senators, struggling with executive power, will catch a new inspiration from his example.

A bishop of the church tells us, "All is not lost while there is a man left to reprove error and bear testimony to the truth; and the man who does it with becoming spirit may stop a Prince or Senate in full career, and recover the day." But where this spirit has been shown—where an honored associate has earned this title to fame—I insist that it shall be made known. The battles or regiments are inscribed on their colors. I now inscribe on the colors of Jacob Collamer the civic battles which he fought. Swords of honor are placed on the coffins of lamented generals. I now place on the coffin of a lamented Senator the simple truthful record of his acts.

At best it is but a combination, a thing of shreds and patches, which is attempting to force this bill through. There is no substance in it; there is no life in it. The two distinguished Senators from Massachusetts who were the chief champions of the force bill are now in the Senate. One of them at that time was in the other House and the bill is sometimes named after him. I submit that my Democratic friends on the other side who stand with us now are as liable to be right as we were right then, and that my honorable friends on the other side of the Chamber who stand with the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts are as liable to be wrong now as those Senators were at that time.

Reference has been made to myself. Language has been used in regard to me because I did not vote, which I hardly think is decorous or fitting for the Senate Chamber. I assume Senators forget that never before in the history of the Senate did the Senate insist on a Senator recording his vote when he stood in their presence and declared, as I declared, and as I declare now, that I think the interests of this country would best be subserved by withholding my vote; that I know the interests of my constituents would best be subserved, and that my judgment and my conscience would not allow me to vote. It is the first time in the history of the Senate when that declaration was made on this floor by a Senator that the majority undertook to force him to vote. Would you force me to violate my conscience and my duty to my constituents? Can you do it? Is there any power residing in this body to compel me to vote?

It this body to compel me to vote?

I think there is no Senator here who appreciates more highly than myself a seat in the Senate. It gives an opportunity for usefulness to me which I could gain in no other way. I have no other ambition. I am not interested in silver mines. The money that I have is with the Secretary of the Senate. I never had $5,000 in my life and never expect to have. My ambition does not run in that direction. My contention is not for mine owners nor is it for bankers. It is my pleasure and delight to sit in the Senate. Yet, if my expulsion from this body would prevent the Yet, if my expulsion from this body would prevent the passage of the pending bill I would not hesitate a moment. You could not make me surrender my judgment and my conscience to the keeping of the rest of the Senators here even if the penalty for refusing were my expulsion. I call attention to the fact that never before was it attempted to coerce the conscience of a Sena-

It is altogether likely that when the rules of the Senate were passed those wise men had in view future actions, and passions, and ambitions of individuals. Is it not fair to conclude that when the present rules of the Senate were drafted the rule allowing unlimited debate was made for a definite purpose? At that time, may it not have been foreseen that with the great patronage the President would have in the future some ambitious President might get control of the majority of Coagress, and that attempts might be made to passlaws which would strongly tend, if not absolutely keep the then controlling party in power, or that they might attempt to pass laws, as in the present case, which would bankrupt the people before a change could be effected? And that to prevent violent resistance to such attempts tending to, if not producing, civil war, the makers of the rule intended it as a mode of peaceful resistance to be used to carry the matter over until the people could be heard from at the next general elec-tion, especially so, as in the present case, when the law intended to be passed was in open contradiction to the will of the people as expressed at the last election?

You have an election every two years, and can anyone say that a law which has been on our statute books for two or three years, which seemed to work well most of the time, will bring permanent disaster to the country if continued until the people can be heard from again? The House of Representatives is elected every two years, and the rule of the Senate allows the Senate to keep the question open until the country can express its sentiment upon it.

Suppose that the President of the United States should send Suppose that the President of the United States should send word to the Senate that he desires a bill passed in the interest of silver, how long do you suppose it would take the Senate to pass that measure? Suppose he would send word to the Senate that whatever the Senate and House of Representatives saw fit to do in their legislative capacity in regard to silver would receive his sanction, how long would it take a financial bill to pass the House and the Senate 'hen?

That is the condition which confront are. You not call i height

That is the condition which confronts us. You not only insist on passing this bill, but you insist that we shall keep a quorum here all the time. The silver men made your quorum this morning—the extreme silver men. You could not have obtained it until noon had it not been for them. As has been pointed out, there has not been an hour when you could have kept a quorum in this body for the passage of the repeal bill without the silver men. There is no sentiment here among the majority in favor of the unconditional repeal of the act. Keep your own quorum in the Chamber. You have no right to ask the silver men to come here Chamber. Tou have no right to task the silver high to come here at 10 o'clock in the morning and stay until 6 o'clock at night unless you yourselves stay here; and so far as I am concerned I shall resort to every expedient in my power which is legitimate to see that you keep a quorum here and that you aid us in this physical struggle and suffer with us. If it is inconvenient for you it is likewise inconvenient for us

There are some things which have been quite as undignified as those done by the friends of silver on this floor. I think the rights and the dignity of the Senate would not be hurt any, to say the least, if a little more attention were given to pairs. When Senators leave the Chamber paired and other Senators are left here unpaired the pairs are transferred at the will of individuals, and not even the consent of their colleagues on this floor has been asked when Senators' pairs are transferred.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I think that is unjust to Senators who merely transfer a pair. I have been in charge of pairs for five or six consequences are consequenced.

charge of pairs for five or six years, since my service in the Senate, and I have never heard the right of any Senator questioned to transfer a pair where he protects the vote of the Senator with whom he is paired by the transfer. That is a universal right, always exercised without question on this floor, the simple question being whether the vote of the Senator with whom he is paired is protected by the transfer.

Mr. DUBOIS. When a Senator pairs he expects his rights to be protected. He is sometimes very careful to pair with a Sinator whom he supposes will preserve that pair for him. Now, it may happen in an indiscriminate transfer, especially when you transfer the pair of a Senator to another Senator who has left unpaired, thereby not signifying plainly what position he would take on the pending measure, that you may pair him with a Senator who will repudiate it at some other time. It may be to his interest and the interest of his constitutions. to his interest and the interest of his constituents to say that he was not so violent on one side or the other. Within my own experience I have known a member of Congress to be defeated for reslection simply because of a pair which was unguardedly made and which he never could explain satisfactorily to his people. I think when pairs are made they are made for the protection of Senators, and they ought not to be transferred so indiscriminately as has been the case during this debate. I should not, and, therefore, will not, say that pairs have been deliberately broken and disregarded.

It is a little amusing to see the changed attitude which Senators and newspapers assume with occasion. The side of the question which they are on makes a wonderful difference with them. More for the edification of the Senate than anything else, I desire to read two or three short editorials from New York papers written when the force bill was pending.

The New York World said at that time: Every device for delay must be used in the Senate; no legal act of any onceivable kind done to prevent the passage of the bill will be other than raiseworthy.

At the same time the New York Herald said:

The minority are quite right to cause delay by every means within their reach. The minority demands that the customs traditions, and usages which have governed the Senate for the last one hundred years shall not be ampered with; a cloture resolution is revolutionary and should not be tol-

The New York Times, speaking of the proposed change of the rules to bring the question to a vote, said

Nothing so subversive of inherent principles of legislation under representative government has ever been attempted in the United States. We are far within the truth when we say that never in the proudest and most insolent period of the dominon of the slave power in Congress was anything so plainly inconsistent with the first principles of our Government done or attempted. The men who are planning and leading the assault on some of the most valuable safeguards of free institutions are also those who have in times past fought with the utmost courage and fidelity against the abuses of Executive influence. utive influe

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask what is the date of the articles he has read:

Mr. DUBOIS. I am not able to answer the Senator. It was during the force-bill fight.

Mr. HILL. But the point I wish to make is that it was after the fall election of 1890. Was it not? Mr. DUBOIS. I am not sure as to that, but they are di-

Mr. Dobots. I am not sure as to that, but they are dreetly in point as to the present contention here.

Mr. HILL. I am very certain that it was, and I simply desire to add in conclusion that the force-bill issue was one of the great issues of the campaign of 1890, and those editorials were written

Mr. DUBOIS. I beg pardon, the bill was pending in the Senate when these editorials were written, and a proposition was under discussion to change the rules during the discussion of that measure. It is perfectly in point.

Mr. President, I do not mean that any Senator on this floor should misunderstand my position. I have the highest personal regard for every member of this body, and I think, with few exceptions, there is no Senator here who imagines for a moment that I desire to do anything which would be personally offensive to him. But feeling as I do, and knowing the effect of the passage of this bill on my own State, as I have said, believing I know the effect of it on the country, I can never consent to the passage of the bill, and you know as well now as you knew a month ago that you can not pass it.

In order to make our contention clear I will briefly state the position of myown State, which is applicable also to other States. Idaho at the World's Fair Exposition took the first prize for fruits of almost every description-green fruit, preserved fruit, fruits in solution.

We took the prize over the great States of California, Oregon, and Washington. We took the prize for our forestry exhibits. We have resources there which will build up one of the finest States in this Union. We have more good agricultural land twice over than there is land in the State of New Jersey. Yet our foundation rests on the mining of gold and silver. We are so far from the markets of the world that we can not ship our produce there; and since this agitation and the closing of our mines every railroad running into our State has gone into the hands of receivers.

Those roads carry out our mineral wealth; they bring back the Those roads carry out our mineral wealth; they oring each the supplies to our people. When you pass the pending bill you not only strike down silver mining, but you strike down gold mining as well. You gold men, perhaps, do not realize it, but when you stop the purchase and coinage of silver, when you close the silver mines, you destroy the gold mines of this country also. From 33 to 40 per cent of all the gold mined in the United States comes are conjunction with silver and it comes in such small quantities. in conjunction with silver, and it comes in such small quantities that it can not be mined for the gold product alone. You must also mine the silver in order to get the gold.

So, when you pass this bill, speaking for my own State, you destroy the fabric of our prosperity. It is not fair, it is not manly, and it is not according to the spirit of the American people. Those men were given the right under the Constitution to dig out these precious metals. At the last election every Senator on this floor was pledged to protect silver. There is not a Senator here who had any authority from his people to absolutely destroy this precious metal. I do not say that he was pledged to free coinage, but none of them dare contend that he has express authority from the people of his State or from his national party to pass this proposed law, which stops the purchase and coinage silver and the issuance of money.

I do not know that I care to say anything more in regard to this matter. If the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE], the other day in his personal attack, is satisfied with the position which he occupies I am. I can not afford in the Senate of the United States to use the language of the bar room, nor will I. I am glad to say that every Senator who has spoken has repudiated the utterances of the Senator from Louisiana, and stands alone in the unique position which he occupies of desiring to hurl any Senator from this Chamber who would not violate his conscience and his duty to his constituents as he saw it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment? What did the Senator from Louisiana say that has been repudlated by this body? I did not know it. The Senator from Louisiana is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. DUBOIS. He thought the Senator from Idaho should be hurled from this Chamber because he would not vote. Do you subscribe to that doctrine?

Mr. HILL. I have not heard that precise question presented. I think that all the Senator from Louisiana suggested to the Senate was that the Senate had the power under the Constitution, and he argued I think also from the rules, to compel a Senator to vote. In other words, I think he argued that remaining in his seat when his name was called when he should have voted was disorderly conduct and disrespectful to the Senate. I think that was all he suggested to the Senate; and I am not aware that that doctrine has been repudiated by any Senator here. I am not aware of it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have not heard of any Senator, the Senator from New York will allow me to say, not even himself, who has gone beyond the point of suggesting that the Senator should be

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, when I was much younger than I am now I was requested to prepare the rules for a debat-ing society. One of the rules was that any member should, upon rising, address the chair, and when recognized should confine himself to the subject under discussion. I came into the Senate this morning and listened to the Senator from Nevada [Mr.

STEWART], whose speeches I always attend and listen to with a great deal of interest, and I supposed that in my absence some measure involving the free coinage of silver, or something else, had been brought before the Senate. I inquired of friends and learned the question before the Senate. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yesterday, when I was present, submitted the following motion:

That the name of H. M. Teller, a Senator from Colorado, be added to the last roll call recorded in the Journal yesterday, made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum of the Senate was present or not.

That is the real question before the Senate, and I am astonished that it has occupied so much time. The Senator from Colorado has been in this body perhaps longer than almost any other Senator, and he has the esteem of every member of this body. His knowledge of parliamentary law is unsurpassed. He presents a personal request to the Senate, that his name shall be "added to the last roll call recorded in the Journal yesterday, made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present or not." Here is a mere personal request from a Senator who knows the facts and circumstances. He knows that he was present; he knows that his name was not added to the roll call. He appears and asks that that courtesy be extended to him; and yet the Senate has occupied nearly two days, not in debating that particular question, but without allowing this

wery reasonable request.

We understand that without something like unanimous consent no action can be taken in this body. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the application made by the Senator from Colorado for himself may be allowed. I do it for the reason that I think it is due to him. I am one of the junior members, for my service in this body is not very long, but I have understood that this is presminently a courtrous body, and that when Senators make personal requests, which are not un-reasonable or improper, they are acceded to upon the ground of that lawful courtesy which we owe to each other. Now, I submit whether this long debate is not discourteous to the Senator from Colorado, who has presented this very simple request, a request that does not appear to be at all unreason ble, and which relates to himself alone. He does not ask that anything shall be done with respect to any other Senator. It is a pure, simple, earnest, honest request for a personal favor that I think ought to be allowed.

Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this order may be made.

Mr. BUTLER. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. DUBOIS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent. The Chair thinks the request should be submitted to the Senate; but there are objections.

Mr. PALMER. If there are objections I confess my astonishment. I have been told of the high supreme courtesy of this body. The other evening I had the misfortune in some sense, ignorantly I confess, to violate one of the rules of the body, and the Senate was courteous enough to excuse that great Now, when I plead that the Senator from Colorado shall have the right to place himself in the attitude he thinks he ought to occupy, and that application is made in respectful language, and made upon facts that are within the knowledge of the Senator himself, gentlemen on this floor, from whom I did not expect an objection, insist that the Senate shall not accede to the wishes the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, the idol is broken. My visions of the absolute, perfect, sublime courtesy of this body are dispelled. I find that here we are sometimes forgetful of that noble generosity which always should characterize a body like this.

I asked unanimous consent, and now that unanimous consent has been refused me I know it is impossible to pass this order. I had supposed the Senate had some regard for the rights of a I understand that we have reached a point where I can not get unanimous consent for this purpose, and I despair. Nothing can be done without unanimous consent. We can not even be civil and courteous and obliging to each other without unanimous consent.

unanimous consent.

Mr. President, I abandon the motion in despair.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in view of the propositions that were made in the Senate on yesterday, in relation to a change of the rules of this body, I desire to submit a few observations in reply to what was then said by the Senators from New York [Mr. HILL] and from Texas [Mr. MILLs]. I do so from the standpoint of a person opposed to the passage of the bill repealing the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, and at the same time I think there is no reason for unfavorable criticism of the Senators here of either political party who entertain different opinions, and who think that greater time should be allowed for its consideration. I believe that a vote can be had when this debate has been exhausted, and that it can much better be this debate has been exhausted, and that it can much better be had, and is much more probable, by following the orderly course of procedure that has at all times heretofore characterized the Senate. In that way I believe it should proceed, in accordance with its customs and its rules.

I justify and defend the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Senators who entertain other opinions in the action they have taken. There is nothing in their action to lessen in any degree the confidence and respect which the people of the United States have for them and for their greatability and zealous patriotism.

I have been ready at all times and I am now ready to vote on the question of the passage of the bill and on all of the proposed amendments.

But upon the point that this body has the power to change its rules, pending the discussion of a particular bill, by a vote of the majority, I desire to submit a few remarks.

The power of the Senate to change its rules is absolute, Mr. President. The power to do a thing authorizes its being done without regard to expediency, without regard to propriety, without regard to the rights of individuals or to the general policies which should characterize all parliamentary proceedings. No one doubts that a majority of this body has the power to do whatever it pleases to do within the scope of its jurisdiction. The Senate may determine the rules of its proceedings, unquestionably. The Senate may enact legislation of the most vicious character, but it may not rightfully do it.

acter, but it may not rightfully do it.

The Senate by a majority of a quorum, 25 votes out of 88, might on receipt of the force bill two years ago from the House, have proceeded to its consideration, laid all amendments on the table, have refused to allow debate, and have enacted it into law. The Senate and the House may enact laws which inflict the punishment of death on the most trivial offenses. The question is not one of power, but one of expediency and right—a question whether the rules and method of proceeding, which have been established for the prevention of an abuse of the power of the majority, shall be rudely disregarded and annulled. majority, shall be rudely disregarded and annulled.

The question is whether or not in the course of parliamentary proceeding which has become tradition in all deliberative bodies rules can be changed by a majority contrary to self-imposed re-

This is not a new question. The remarks made by the Senator from Texas yesterday are not new. The proposition that the majority have the power under the Constitution to change its rules, and that the majority of a quorum is the operative legislative power, has been repeatedly asserted and always recognized. But that is not the proposition to be considered when you propose to change the rules by the action of a majority acting in violation and entire disregard of the limitations and strictions that the body has imposed upon itself by rule. That is the question which is presented here.

I wish now, Mr. President, to refer to one notable case which came up in the other House in the year 1882. At that time Mr. Reed, a member from Maine, called up for consideration a proposition to amend the rules reported from the Committee on Rules.

read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 29th of May,

The Speaker. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Maine calls up for consideration the report made by him on Saturday last from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Randall. And against that I raise the question of consideration.

[Mr. Kenna. And pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Blackburn. And I move to amend that motion so that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next, to-morrow being Decoration Day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not mean to amend the motion to ad-

Mr. BLACKBURN. No: I offer it as a substitute for the motion to adjourn. Mr. Spraker. It need not be in the form of a substitute: it is a prior m tion.

Mr. BLACKBUEN. I submit it as an independent motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBUEN] moves that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next; and states as a reason that he desires to adjourn over Decoration Day.

Mr. RANDALL. And upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

And so on. In the discussion of the proposition I will quote first from what Mr. REED says:

first from what Mr. REED says:

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the propositions which I shall have to make I shall endeavor to state succinctly as I can, confining myself strictly to the question of parliamentary law, making no observations outside of it, except what seems to me necessary in order to a full understanding of the case. The House of Representatives acts under the Constitution of the United States. It has certain powers expressly conferred upon it as a separate body, powers which it can exercise without either the let or hindrance of any other body, powers which it is obliged to retain, powers which it can never trade away. Those powers are ever present with it, and it is bound to act in obselience and in furtherance of those powers.

The first one which I will call attention to is in section 5 of the Constitution:

The first one which I will call attention to is in section 5 of the Constitu-tion:
"Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do husiness."

Under that provision of the Constitution we have been endeavoring for a period of eight or ten days to judge of the right of one of our members to his seat. Under the forms of the rules of the House that endeavor on the part of the House, although a majority constituting a quorum necessary to do business has been here and ready to act, has been entirely frustrated.

It will be seen, now, that here is the proposition that was made in the observations of the Senator from New York yesterday that it is the rightful duty and power of the Senato or of the House to change its rules irrespective of the existing rules and of self-imposed limitations. Mr. REED further says:

of self-imposed limitations. Mr. REED further says:

I do not propose to spend any time on the question of whether these metions are dilatory motions. Every man with brains in his head knows that is the purpose of them, knows that is the object and intention of them, and can not be blinded by any suggestions. We have no right to go into questions of motives. As I said before on another question, to impute improper motives to members is unsuitable, but to proclaim their obvious purpose is the right of any man with organs of perception and brains capable of recoming the impressions made upon those organs. I shall therefore spend no time—I shall take it for granted that this House comprehends what no school boy could fail to comprehend, that the series of motions made to-day were made for the express purpose of delay and of preventing a change of rules. I manificant the proposition that wherever it is imposed upon Congress to accomplish a certain work, whether by the Constitution or by a law, it is the duty of the Speaker, who represents the House, and in his official capacity is the embodiment of the House, to carry out that rule of law or of the Constitution. It then becomes his duty to see that no factious opposition prevents the House from doing its duty. He must brush away all unlawful combinations to misuse the rules and must hold the House strictly to its work. And I am fortified in my proposition in regard to law by a very distinguished authority acting upon a distinguished scene, and occupying a position in which, if he is wise, he will be willing and glad to pass into history.

That was the ruling of Mr. Speaker Randall upon a question eration, the law by which the two Houses of Congress were required to count a vote in a particular way. Mr. Rendall in his reply stated that in that case he decided these dilatory motions to be out of order, because this special action of the two Houses of Congress in relation to the law which constituted the Electoral Commission was binding upon him for that purpose and to that extent, instead of the rules of the House.

But I desire that this important proposition, which is urged here with great force as the ground of some future and contem-plated action, shall be presented to the consideration of the country in the light in which it occured in a former proceeding of the two Houses at different important times. In that debate, Mr. President, a very distinguished man, of whom I have the highest opinion, occupying now an eminent position, of which I consider him entirely worthy, and whose conduct in that respect I justify, the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, participated, and with his usual ability and clear analysis of every question discussed the proposition whether or not it was under any circumstances to be permitted, in a free country and in a free and deliberative body, pending the consideration of any bill or important question, that there should be a change in the rules by the action of a majority, disregarding the limita-tions imposed by the body upon itself.

This was the question presented here yesterday, viz: That each House of Congress has the power by a majority to adopt rules to suppress all debate, to forbid all amendment, to rush with military force and despotism any measure through. Everybody will admit, as a mere question of power, that the Senate may do this, but the question remains whether or not, under the parliamentary law of England and the history of our own country, under any circumstances, it is to be tolerated that the action of a majority shall change the rules, notwithstanding the limitations that have been imposed upon the majority in respect of a change of the rules.

This has been at all times a subject of the greatest importance, and on the preservation and maintenance of the principles of parliamentary law established in the experience of the English pariamentary law established in the experience of the English people depends the liberties and rights of the people. At all times the privileged classes have sought to give absolute power to a majority of a quorum—a minority of the people and a minority of the whole number of the people's representatives. That was the proposition of the Senator from Texas on yesterday, viz, to give power to a majority of a quorum and a minority of the whole body.

After debate Mr. Carlisle said:

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who makes the point of order, began the discussion by calling the attention of the Chair to two of the provisions of the Constitution. The first was that provision which declares that:
"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."
The second was that provision of the Constitution which declares that each House may determine the rules for the regulation or government of its proceedings.

House may determine the rules for the regulation or government of its proceedings.

The Constitution declares in the clause which has been read by the gentleman from Maine that—

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a

The gentleman from Maine argues that it necessarily results from this treating it as an original delegation of power to the House, that the House shall have at all times, under all circumstances, not only the right to establish its rules in the first instance, but the right at any moment and by any judges it may consider proper, to change its rules after they have been esponsion of the stablish its rules can not be taken away from it. It always exists and it always must exist.

But the question with which we are confronted this morning is not as to the continued existence of this power on the part of the House, but as to the continued existence of this power on the part of the House, but as to the continued existence of this power on the part of the House, but as to the rolling of the House itself, in the execution of this right and in the discharge of this duty, to prescribe the mode and manner in which it will change its of the discharge of the House, we have already established rules: we have passed beyond the point which was presented on that memorable historic occasion alluded to by the which was presented on that memorable historic occasion alluded to by the geni man from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] when John Quincy Adams announced that the House has utterly without rules. It was in a disorganized and chaotic condition. Its presiding officer even had not been chosen; it had no officers of any kind to execute its will, and no means of declaring what its will was. Under those circumstances to was the right and the duty of the House, or of those gentlemen who would compose the House when organized, to proceed in the first instance to provide the machinery by and through which they could give an expression of their will.

But, as already stated, we have passed beyond that point. This House at its present session has ordanice and established rules, and in my judgment we are bound by them in all our proceedings upon this floor.

The proposition of the genileman from Maine [Mr. Rred] is that having established rules for our own government which by their terms apply in all cases and govern the House and the speaker under all circumstances, we are all liberty to disr

the consideration of that measure; and so you may go on and on from the beginning to the end, until your rules are frittered away and there is nothing to govern the proceedings of this House but the arbitrary will of one man or the arbitrary will of the majority. (Appiause on the Democratic side.)

And there is where we stand this morning, and the country may as well understand it. The proposition made by the gentleman from Maine, that we can disregard these rules upon this occasion, has been expressly met by a continuous proposition made by the gentleman from Maine, that we can disregard these rules upon this occasion, has been expressly met by a continuous proposition of the proposition of the gentleman who has been quoted by the gentleman from Maine. I allude to Gen. Garfield.

In the Forty-dith Congress a gentleman up n this side of the House undertook to offer a resolution providing for a change in our rules; and in his argument he took substantially the position now taken by the gentleman from Maine this morning, that the right of the House to change its rules was an inhere t and constitutional right and continued at all times. What did Gen. Garfield say in response?

In response to my friend from Texas would carry the power of the House in this respect further than the Constitution justifies. It [the Constitution] empowers each House to make rules, and one of the rules which this House has made prescribes how the rules shall be amended."

IAPPlause on the Democratic side.]

There is a complete and comprehens Maine this morning. Gen. Garfield was as long a member of this House, perhaps longer, than the gentleman alluded to who had the honor to preside over its deliberations for several years. He was a member of the Committee on Rules during a great portion of the period of his service. He was acknowledged everywhere as an eminent parliamentarian; and in this single terse, concise sentence he sums up and states the whole argument on this question.

Now the gentleman from Lowa [Mr. Kasson] rose in his place mentary usage, two motions to adjourn can not be made unless business has intervened. It has been ruled in this House for the last twenty years that after a motion to adjourn, a motion to adjourn to a specific day is new bustness. Therefore a member can move to adjourn, get the yeas and nays on that motion, and then superimpose on that a motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to a certain day, and that latter motion being considered business; and thus the two motions may be repeated ad in infailum, or so long as one-fifth of the House are willing to demand the yeas and nays on these two dilatory motions."

There was an express admission—
Mr. Burrows of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Kentucky read the remainder of Mr. Garfield's remarks?

Mr. Carlisle I will.

"Now, the experience of the last week has shown that a body of one-fifth of the House can say to the House that there is a class of public measures which not only shall not be voted on, but which shall not even be taken up for consideration—neither for debate, for amendment, nor for passage."

The gentleman will be kind enough to indicate when I have read enough. Mr. Burrows of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. Carlisle. No, sir; I will read it.

Mr. Carlisle. No, sir; I will read it.

Mr. Springer. It is very good reading.

Mr. Carlisle (reading):

"And we have seen this illustrated in the attempt of the House to consider—not to pass, but to consider, to amend, to debate the bill relating to civil rights of American citizens. The majority on this floor believe the House ought to consider that bill. They believe they ought to have brought to this House, "You may take up an appropriation bill and pass it: you may do such things as we shall select and point out to you; but you shall not even consider any bill that we, the minority, do not consent to.' This demand is intolerable, is revolutionary, and can not be submitted to without dishonor."

Mr. Speaker, allusion has been made to the provocation for the introduction of this report. I shall certainly not go beyond the limits of legitimate discussion upon this point of order to meet any allegation that may have been made on the other side; and I do not think I am doing so in saying that I agree with the gentleman from Iowa that in the consideration of contested-election cases we act in at least a quasi judicial capacity. We have under our care and subject to our determination not only the rights of the constituencies whose representatives are seeking seats upon this floor, but the very existence of this House itself and, to some extent at least, the private individual rights of the contesting parties. We occupy towards them substantially the same relation which a court of justice occupies towards litigants at its bar. If, looking at the record they have brought before us, we believe it is of such a character that they ought not to be forced to go to trial upon it, it is as much our duty to say so as it is the duty of a court of justice under similar circumstances.

And I venture to say, in view of the allegations which are made and the affidavits that have been presented, that there is not an enlightened court of justice in Christendom that would not suppress the testimony in the case alluded to and afford the party an opportunity to retake it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is against a failure or refusal to do this simple act of justice that we have resorted to our undoubted parliamentary rights in this matter.

As was well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall], this assestands alone. It has no connection with any other election case. It is eligit treated here by members on this side of the House as a case standing

I had no purpose when this discussion commenced this morning to say a word, and I ought to apologize to the House, and more especially to the Speaker, to whom my remarks have been addressed, for having spoken so the control of the [Applause.]

It is obvious that you can not have rules at all, as stated by him, if the majority is not restrained by the limitation imposed upon the amendment of rules, because that majority may upon any occasion, upon the amendment of rules, dispense with all limitations and all rules, and there will be no rule left. That is state of affairs that has never occurred in any deliberative body in a free country, to be subject at the moment to the sovereign will of the majority. I venture to assert that that condition has never existed in any legislative body. It is a proposition that instantaneous and immediate action may be had without debate, without amendment, without consideration. Such action as that on the part of a majority means the entire suppression of all deliberative proceedings.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. George] desires me to read what Mr. Randall said at that time, and I will do so briefly. Mr. Randall said:

I do not believe there is any one, a member of this House, who will dissent from the opinion which I express, that the rules of a legislative body have for their principal purpose the orderly proceeding of business, and next the protection of the rights of the minority. In support of that position I desire to have the Clerk read what I send to the desk as the enunciation of a man who for nearly a third of a century, I think, was the speaker of the House of Commons in England, Mr. Onslow.

Thereupon the Clerk read a statement to the effect that the rules were absolutely necessary for the protection of the minority and for free debate and amendment.

and for free debate and amendment.

Mr. Randall. It is remarkable how closely all American legislative bodies have adhered to the principle there stated in their parliamentary government. Every presiding officer of almost every legislative body in the United States has always deemed, in the administration and execution of rules, that he stood as a protector of the minority in such administration.

The power which is given to us to form rules is derived from the second clause of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution, in these words: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Under that authority this House at this session has made rules for its government; and in those very rules provision is made for the motions which we have herezofore submitted and had the House vote upon.

Moreover, those very rules prescribe the manner in which they shall be changed, just as the Constitution itself prescribed the manner in which that instrument shall be changed. And when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] seeks to exercise the power which he has attempted as derived from the Constitution he must of necessity go behind that instrument itself.

The gentleman to my mind has been exceedingly unfortunate in the cases to which he has alluded as warranting this procedure on his part. First, he has alluded to decisions which I made as the Speaker of this House in the electoral count of 1877. They were decisions which I then thought right, and by which I am now willing to stand or fall. Those decisions sustain the position taken by this side of the House in this, that it required a law to interrupt the proceedings of the House when they were in accord with the rules of the House if they interfered with the due execution of such law. There is no law now in reference to this case which interferes in the least with the provisions of our rules.

I will remark here that that was the Electoral Commission

I will remark here that that was the Electoral Commission law, a special and peculiar case for the government of the two

Mr. RANDALL. Allowed under the law. The law bound me. To me the law was higher than the rules when the law came in conflict with the rules. The House concurred in that position by an overwhelming vote. Our present rules provide the manner in which we may even temporarily pass from under their operation, and that is by a suspension of the rules, and also provide the manner of making changes when deemed desirable. That brings me to the alleged decision, or rather to the dictum, of the gentleman from Maine, who then was Speaker, Mr. Blaine, on which the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Rexd) seems to rely.

While Mr. Blaine then asserted that he had "repeatedly ruled that pending a proposition to change the rules dilatory motions could not be entertained, yet I have never seen, nor has the gentleman from Maine cited to us, any insuance in which Mr. Blaine, except perhaps by unanimous consent, ever enforced such a construction or made such a decision, and I have made diligent search therefor: He certainly did not on that occasion assert such a power as in the House when the civil-rights bill was under consideration; it was mere dictum of his, and was never either pressed by him nor did the House then and there take advantage of any such dictum, for I find that repeated efforts were then made by gentlemen, some of whom are now members of the House, to change the rules by motions to suspend the rules—a method prescribed in the rules themselves.

It was participated in That debate is quite an extended one. by a number of very eminent men—Mr. Kasson, Mr. Kenna, who was our late distinguished and lamented colleague, Mr. Reed, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Carlisle, and our colleague, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]:

Mr. Carlisle. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, no gentleman on the other side of the House will undertake to say that Gen. Garfield was a revolutionist; and I presume also that no gentleman on that side will undertake to say, in the face of the official records of this body, that Gen. Garfield did not, after the utterances which have been read here to-day, often engage in just such proceedings as this side of the House has been engaged in for some days past.

Now we go on:

Mr. BLACKBURN. * * * There are some propositions upon which I take it from this debate, we are all agreed; first, as to the inherent power of this House as a deliberative body to make or to change its own rules, and that we are bound by those rules. We also believe that it is as much within its power to-day to change and alter its rules as it was in its power in the first instance to make new rules, or to establish the rules of the preceding House, when it came together as a deliberative body.

we are counted by another wiles, or to establish the rules of the preceding House, when it came together as a deliberative body.

That, however is not the issue between us.

Some gautiemen are her as estimated that the tendence of the preceding House, when the House has the right to again excertise half proven the secretary that the House has the right to again excertise that proven consider the limitation which it has itself imposed in reference to are considered that the House has the right to again excertise that proven change, after, or annul its rules, we insist nevertheless that it must don change, after, or annul its rules, we insist nevertheless that it must don change, after, or annul its rules, we insist nevertheless that it must don the consideration. Admitting that to be true, what does it proved the terms and the rules of the consideration. Admitting that to be true, what does it proved the rules of th

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that either side of this House lacks the men that are willing to consider carefully and fairly the far-reaching results men that are willing to consider carefully and fairly the far-reaching results that must attach to the effort. A do not believe that the present occupant of that Speaker will we will abstate or refuse to measure carefully, to weigh of that Speaker will we will abstate or refuse to measure carefully, to weigh of that Speaker will an aturally follow. Is it that you are so anxious to determine this one contested-election case that you will not only jeopardize, but mine this one contested-election case that you will not only jeopardize, but mentary comploy? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that the opposition we have offered necessary to employ? Do you complain that you will tear down the plaints of the temple itself in order to crush it out? Why, pather we have been right or wrong in the contest that we have a contested election case on the docket of your committee, there is not a sometime of the bar of this House that we are not ready and willing to take up him to the bar of this House that we are not ready and willing to take up him to the bar of this House that we not ready and willing to take up him to onsider. There are those points in reference to this case that have been stated and restated, and that I need not repeat, which constitute it in the ludgment of this side of the House an exceptional case.

We stand ready for the consideration and transaction of any other contested election cases, you will bring us, for any appropriation bill, for the majority side, refused to adopt it. In the course of that debate the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] said:

"Mr. Chairman, if it was my purpose to reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Phister], it seems to me that it would be a suitable and proper reply to say to him that the constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House. It is not the visible presence of members, but their judgments and their votes that the Constitution calls for.

"I prefer, however, in the short time which I have, to discuss this question upon a different basis. This privilege, which the minority of this House at the last session availed itself of, is a privilege which every minority has availed itself of since the foundation of this Government. By pure accident, looking over an index of the Records this morning, I found the account of a resolution, which was drawn up by a distinguished member of this House from Massachusetts, Mr. Butler, to cause the arrest of a distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] for not voting. I believe, however, nothing ever came of that resolution.

"Now, what is the practical upshot of the present practice? It is that the members of the minority of this House upon great occasions demand that every bill which is passed shall receive the absolute vote of a majority of the members elected. They do this in the face and eyes of the country. If they demand upon any frivolous occasion that there shall be such an extraordinary vote as that, they do it subject to the censure of the people of this land. This practice has hitherto kept this House in proper condition upon this subject, so that there has been no improper impeding of the public business.

It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the business.

It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the right by this extraordinary mode of proceeding to call the attention of the country to measures which a party in a moment of madness and of party feeling is endeavoring to enforce upon the citizens of this land. And it works equally well with regard to all parties, for all parties have their times when they need to be checked, so that they may receive the opinions of the people who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation.

who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation."

Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Reed. I am glad for once to have the approval of the Democratic side of this House. What has been read is sound sense to-day, and that is why I wonder at your approval of it. [Langhter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Gentleman who confront me upon that side of the House know as well as I can tell them that a shorter period of time than has been consumed here in the effort to get up this case would have sufficed for the fullest investigation and fairest adjustment of the issue that is pending.

Now in conclusion I have but to repeat that I sincerely appeal to the presiding officer of this House, whose judgment is invoked, I honestly and earnestly appeal to those who sit around me on both sides of this Chamber, to weigh well the action that is to be taken in this effort to inaugurate a movement that practically repeals every provision of rules that this House has for its government. It is proposed to turn the American Congress, or this branch of it, without any limitation, without any restraint, over to be guided by a partisan majority.

And more, whenever a piece of jobbery looking to the plunder and pillage of the Federal Treasury, by means of lobbyists or what not, is able to command a bare majority vote of this House, away go your rules in order that the public Treasury may be opened to their raidings. It leaves no limitation; it is the entering wedge for the aboution of parliamentary government, not in contested elections only, but in every species of legislation with which we stand charged as a duty here.

I do not doubt that there are those, as honestly and warmly supporting the other side of this contested-election case as I or any here are opposing it, that would sooner see that election case never touched again, sooner see the parties to that contest on the one side or the other suffer a deprivation of their rights, far sooner see the people of that one district in South Carolina left without a Representative here, than to see the power of the American Congress and the destinies of this Government turned over to an irresponsible, maddened, and unicensed majority. [Applause on the Democratic side and laughter on the Republican side.]

That debate went on, and finally, amongst others, the question was discussed by a very distinguished and eminent and brilliant man, whose untimely death we, who were his associates in these two Houses of Congress, have long and will always regret—Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York. He said:

two Houses of Congress, have long and will always regret—Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York. He said:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

There is nothing said in that clause that is exceptional. It has no limitation upon either House of Congress. We may make rules, not for certain purposes, but for all purposes. It is not said that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, except as to the admission of a member or the methods regulating our approaching judgment upon the qualifications of a member. There is no restriction or limitation upon that grant of power. It is unqualified; as much so as the other clauses of the fifth section of the first article, which allow each House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Every rule made by us, consistent with the tenor of the Constitution, is, if not a part of the Constitution, a subordination as sacred as the Constitution itself.

We have made our rules. Among them are rules which regulate these proceedings. They provide the mode of amending the rules themselves. Alt hese rules remain. They remain, since there is no exception, for every proceeding in this House, and a fortiori for the most important proceeding. Can there be any proceeding more important than the admission of a member? Is it not more necessary, Mr. Speaker, that we should have steadfast rules for such a purpose? Is it not most important that we have a law unto ourselves, a law of this House, fixed and irrevocable except by the prescribed rules or modes?

It is more necessary, sir, for rules to be observed in such a case than in any other except perhaps one. And what is that other one? That is in relation to the apportionment of members every decade according to population. This apportionment is the foundation of our system of representative government. But we know, alasi too well, Mr. Speaker, that when this House was engaged in the last Congress in endeavoring to apportion members according to the census returns, and when there was an eme trict, and to save the people some eleven million dollars of expense. It was not this side of the House, but the other, which intervened to prevent by dilatory motions.

That other side was led by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Robeson], who protests his virtuous indignation on this occasion. It was their frivolous delays which prevented the enactment of a law for apportionment. They are responsible for the consequences of such delay—the most serious that can happen to a republican constitutional system. They prevented such a law, sir.

Mr. Hooker, Defeated.

Mr. Cox of New York. Hour after hour, day after day, all night that bill was delayed on dilatory motions for adjournment and what not, until the session was nearly run out, and we had no chance except on the last day of the session, when on my own motion, consenting to all they asked, we got at last a vote on the proposition for 319 members. The cost and trouble, the unfairness of representation, the election of Congressmen-at-large, and other misadventures, are due to the Republicans, who set us this example which we have followed on a less consequential object.

But you gentlemen on the other side are not peculiar in your relation to filibustering on the apportionment bill. I might in the last Congress have made the point that that bill was constitutional and was of the highest sanction, above all rules; or we might have changed by a majority vote, as you now attempt, the rules and stopped your expensive and unrepublican filibustering. We did not do it. We pursued our rules, and you pursued your disorderly conduct. You left us without this indispensable legislation; you remitted it to the present session: you had your own will: you, the minority, defeated us; you pursued this very course with which you now reproach us, not merely on the apportionment bill, but in the Forty-sixth Congress on the tariff bill again and again on motions to refer it to a friendly committee; you did it on the funding bill and on the

I do not believe very much in this business of filibustering. When the apportionment bill, to which I had given much study, was treated to this inhospitable reception, regardless of the wish of the majority. I resolved that I would never follow your bad example. I have been, however, the past week drawn into its vortex almost against my will. But I have been in good company and for a very good purpose. You pursued it in very bad company for a very bad purpose. [Laughter.] Gentlemen say that they will make this proposed new rule or change existing rules under the superior vigor of the Constitution. "Suprema lea" cries out our Ajax from New Jersey. [Laughter.] The Constitution, he says, is the supreme law, and a rule unto us for legislative purposes of this nature. Why, sir, if the Constitution be such a rule of duty and a law unto the House, what need for any other rule? Why undertake to make rules of proceeding? Why "determine" any rule? Oh, says the distinguished gentleman from such as dilatory motions; and we propose to change the rule so as to have a mode of procedure a.d. not of obstruction. If that be the purpose, then all rules for delay, such as adjournment or debate or recommittal or anything except arbitrariness, should be abrogated.

There is one appropriation bill which has not yet been reported. It is the naval appropriation bill. [Laughter.] The custom has been heretofore to have that bill reported early in the session. Six months of this session have gone and we have not yet seen any naval appropriation bill.

Now, are we to roll this dilatory stone out of the way for this case only? Or is it in order that if there be fillbustering on that naval bill or other bills as to a new Navy, the majority at any time may by this convenient change of the rules brush the "obstruction" out of the way? Ten millions of dollars perhaps may be involved in that bill, or twenty millions, or there may be other bills involving hundreds of millions yet to be brought in. If you can do it unto the least of these, you can do it unto every bill hereafter. [Laughter.]

So, now, Mr. Speaker, we contend that in making rules here we must fol-w "the mode prescribed." This mode is the existing rules. For making or unmaking rules, which are a law or a constitution of our House, the rules existing must be observed. Any other mode is a flagrant breach of the law of this flouse, and as law-abiding members we denounce it.

All the amendments of the Constitution from the beginning, including those guaranties and immunities of civil liberty—liberty of conscience, free speech fair trial, bail, delegated powers, judicial rights, the electoral clage, citizenship, disabilities, apportionment—all the amendments until you come down to the great and boasted amendments in regard to human liberty, suffrage, and civil rights were passed in pursuance of the 'mode prescribed.' They were submitted through the two-thirds vote of Congress to the States for ratification.

He is a revolutionist who would seek to change our Constitution except in the prescribed mode. He is no less a revolutionist who, to seat a member, would override existing rules here, not repealed or changed; and he is worse than a revolutionist who, to seat a member, would overrure our rules to seat a member in a case involving fraud and corrupted by forgery.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when you rule, if you dare rule, as perhaps you may rule in this partisan excitement, if you rule that you can, irrespective of the 'mode prescribed,' and regardless of the rules which are now the law of this House, force this summary proceeding through by arbitrary ruling, you will defeat, you will abrogate every cannot of interpretation belonging to the amending and making of law, organic or other law.

As I said before, I am not one who favors fillbustering. It may be a good remedy in great emergencies. The Republicans have so deemed it, judging by their action herecofore. But when the honorable member from Virainia [Mr. TCOKRE] offered an amendment to the new rules providing that fill bustering should cease, torn up by the roots, who met to confuse him in debate? The first member who attacked that proposition was Gen. HAWLEY, a shining light in the Republican party. He was followed by Gen. Garfield, a man of confessed parliamentary ability; the gentleman from Mains [Mr. REED], who has shown us here to-day his ability in stradding upon this question. [Laughter.] And Mr. Conger of Michigan, then your best parliamentarian, who led your fillbustering scouting parties. The gentleman from Virginia was so thoroughly overwhelmed by the argumentation and denunciation coming from these able debaters of your party, urging minority rights, that on the subsequent Tuesday he withdrew his proposition. It seems to me that gentlemen on the other side, when they undertake to say that we are revolutionary—that we are guilty of "parliamentary revolution," to use the language of the gentleman from Kansas—ought first to look at their own record. That record convicts them. The gentleman from Kansas, when he talked about "parliamentary revolution," ought to have thought of his own conduct on the apportument bill.

Ail I have to say to gentlemen is that when they charge this side of the House with "parliamentary revolution," they are, in view of their own recent action and sentiment, nothing more nor less than whited sepulchres, inside full of dead men's bones, outside fair and seeming before the people. I prove, therefore, what I say.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] referred to the fact that we are a great representative body. So we are. He declaimed eloquently that the majority here should rule. He asserted that no other body like ours in the history of the world would ever allow a minority to dictate terms. Ah, did he forget that in the English Parliament of six hundred and fifty-odd members, forty only, by motions to adjourn and other "obstructions," had kept that great Government of the British Empire almost in the very throes of agony for weeks and months as the only way to remedy great and century-old wrongs borne by a portion of the United Kingdom without refress?

These wrongs, now and by recent events confessed to be great, unredressed grievances, are in process of relief by the courage and persistence of a small minority. Does he not know that the great premier of England threatened to throttle that minority by a cloture? But even he, sir, had not the courage or strength to bring that cloture to a division, and minority right remains to-day, as it has been in the British parliamentary constitutions for hundreds of years, as a fundamental part of those rules which were made in the interest of the minority for the protection of parliamentary privilege and civil-liberty through all the ages. [Great applause.]

Mr. President, I am and have been, with many others opposed to the passage of this bill, ready to vote at any moment. There has been no filibustering in the sense in which it occurred in the House of Representatives at the time to which I have been re-There have been no motions, such as were made 1879, for adjournment and adjournment to a day certain and adjournment to a particular hour and for executive business, consuming whole nights. Senators here have claimed the right of discussion—it may be prolonged discussion—they have claimed the right to exhaust themselves and exhaust the subject; they have proclaimed that, in their belief, the passage of this bill would produce widespread ruin and disaster, perhaps revolution; that it would increase and intensify the want and suffering of the

They have a right to these opinions; they have a right to present them to the American people; and whilst I should have been glad to have seen this debate terminated, and am willing at any time so far as I am concerned to see it done, yet I think it is highly inexpedient, unwise, and destructive of this body and the respect which it should have with the people of this country to close debate over the heads of these Senators by a change of the

Mr. President, the history of this country is full of instances where, through such action as this, great public detriment may have occurred for the time, but where the result was highly advantageous to the people, and subsequent events vindicated such action

So, for one, I wish to say that the observations which have been made here, inviting and vindicating a change of these rules, without regard to the limitations imposed by this body, for the purpose of passing the pending bill or any other bill, are, in my opinion, the most fatal and destructive things to this body which

I believe that the American people look with pride upon the exhibition which this body has made. I believe that more than a million majority of the people would sustain them, whatever may be their opinion upon the question of policy, whether they may be their opinion upon the question of policy, whether they are in favor of repeal or against repeal, whether in favor of free coinage—I believe the spectacle presented by this body of insisting upon the fullest and freest expression of opinion and judgment, and prolonged consideration of a great public question, commands their admiration and research then the arguments of the distinguish. If it does not, then the arguments of the distinguished men who have gone before us are all wrong, and the argument of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury was all wrong. I have repeatedly said, opposing, as I do, the repeal of the Sher. I have repeatedly said, opposing, as I do, the repeat of the Sherman law, that I justify and vindicate him as an executive officer for following his own judgment under the conditions and circumstances which have existed in this country for some months past.

I wish further to say, that the speediest way to bring about a one further to say, that the spectaest way to bring about a vote on this bill is orderly procedure here. If public opinion is concentrating and consolidating throughout this country, it will be felt in this Chamber, and all Senators will bend to it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in what I am about to say in regard to the pending motion, I trust I shall not be betrayed into misrepresenting the position of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] or that of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. It im not mistaken in their position, I feel bound to say that the propositions which they have submitted for the consideration of the Senate, as I understand them, appear to me to be little less than monstrous, and I must express my surprise that Senators of their experience, ability, and patriotism should, in a body like the United States Senate, or in the United States Senate, delib-erately propose to violate not only every tradition of this body, but every law which has been adopted for its government from its foundation to the present time.

I want to say here and now, sir, in connection with the propositions of those two Senators that if they should be adopted by the Senate, it would reduce this body to a plane with a town meeting trying to elect a town constable; if their propositions should be adopted by the Senate, we shall have bedlam in this body, if not anarchy, instead of orderly procedure and dignified depositions.

deportment. In order that I may not be misunderstood, I will state what I understand to be their position; and I am sorry the Senator from Texas is not in his seat. I understand the position of those Senators to be that at any moment, at any hour, on any day the majority in this body may change its rules without regard to the mode provided in the rules for the government of the body; that mode provided in the rules for the government of the body; that by the exercise of brute force a majority of this body to-day can, of its own motion, without regard to the rules, introduce an amendment to the rules and pass it in utter disregard of this code of rules which I hold in my hand. The effect of that would be, as I understand, that a majority to-day may modify or change the rules to suit itself; and if that majority fades by this hour to-morrow, that majority may reverse and revoke that rule and make another. That I understand to be the proposition of the two Senators, the one from Texas and the other from New York I repeat, Mr. President, to my mind it is little less than monstrous, and fills me with surprise and amazement.

I hold in my hand the code of the standing rules of the Sen ate, 40 in number, followed by the rules of procedure and prac tice in the Senate when sitting on the trial of impeachments; followed by rules for the regulation of the Senate wing of the United States Capitol. They are followed by the standing orders of the Senate, not embraced in the rules, and such parts of acts as affect the business of the Senate, and so on.

The fortieth rule provides as follows:

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause I, Rule XII.

Sir, I had always supposed, until this new dispensation of the Senators from New York and of Texas, that this body was as much governed and controlled by that code of rules as any court on this continent is governed by the code of rules which it makes for its own government. I had supposed that this code of rules was as binding upon me as the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are binding upon every citizen of this converter, but we are told by the Senator row New citizen of this country; but we are told by the Senator rom New York and the Senator from Texas that we are not bound by these rules; that a majority of this body, in the exercise of its sweet will or caprice, may trample on or amend the rules of this body to suit that caprice or sweet will. If that be so, why perform the farce, the absurd farce, of keeping these rules on our desks for our guidance? Why not make a bonfire of them, and relieve this Chamber of the impediments which they make to our pro-

Why not turn over to these two distinguished leaders of this new dispensation, as the leaders of their so-called majority, the transaction of all the business of this Senate, if their doctrine be the correct one?

The Senator from Texas told us yesterday evening that the Senate had the inherent right and power to amend the rules. Who has denied that, sir? I have heard no denial of such a proposition. Of course, this, like every other parliamentary body, has control over its rules, and it has exercised that control over and over again in amendments suggested and adopted in an and over again in amendments suggested and adopted in an orderly, decent, and lawful way, as prescribed by the fortieth rule of this code of rules—one day's notice, a reference to the Committee on Rules, a report from that committee, debate on the report, and the adoption or rejection of it. That is the manner and the method, I had always supposed, in a deliberative parliamentary body to amend the rules of its conduct and action. Now, we are told, because certain Senators find themselves in a majority in this body, overanxious to have one bill passed, that we shall throw to the winds and scatter from our sight the rules which have been sanctified by time and approved by the that we shall throw to the winds and scatter from our sight the rules which have been sanctified by time and approved by the greatest constitutional lawyers this country has ever produced, and that that majority shall run roughshod over the minority and pass their measure in utter disregard of the rights of that minor-That I understand to be the proposition of those two Sen. If I have misrepresented them, I shall be delighted if they will correct me.

Some change has come over the spirit of the dream of my distinguished friend from Texas. I do not know that my friend from New York ever had a dream. [Laughter.] The Senator from Texas has made a record on this subject. He has been in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the public prints in regard to the rights of minorities and manufacture in the rights of minorities a public prints in regard to the rights of inhorities and ha-jorities; he appears in the public records of this Congress fre-quently on that subject; and, whilst consistency has been said to be a jowel, and I think correctly so said, I should not hold that konorable Senator down to the utterances of a lifetime in order that he might comply with that quality of consistency, because all men change their minds, especially great men like the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New York; they are allowed to change their minds; but, Mr. President, when that change does take place, some better reason should be as-signed for it, I respectfully submit, than that now assigned by those two Senators.

I find in the North American Review of December, 1889, about four years ago, an article prepared for that periodical by the honorable Senator from Texas. After paying his respects to the Republican party in the first paragraph, he says:

The rules of the House are intended, primarily, to facilitate the dispatch of business; but they are also intended, like other laws, to protect the weak against the strong. In the first paragraph of his parliamentary manual, Mr. Jefferson quotes with approval the language of Speaker Onslow, whom he characterizes as "the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons." Mr. Onslow said that the rules of proceeding, "as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority," and that they were "in many instances a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power."

He then gives what Mr. Jefferson said, which has, I believe, been quoted here this morning. Then the writer goes on and

Before these checks against irregularities and abuses are removed, it should be shown that the nature of power has changed, and that it is not now actuated by a spirit of wantonness. When that high standard of moral perfection is reached by Republican Congressment, their Democratic opponents will throw no hindrance in the way of their progress.

May I be permitted, Mr. President, to paraphrase that sentence, to say that when the high standard of moral perfection is reached by the so-called majority of this body on this bill, their opponents will throw no hindrance in the way of their progress?

The same argument now made against the rules of the House could be made with equal force against the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of all the States that compose the Union. All of these rules are but rules for the government of political societies; and in all of them there are obstructions thrown across the path the majority may wish to go. The founders of our Government had been taught in the school of experience that the multitude clothed with unlimited power was as dangerous as the single despot; that arbitrary power was the same whether it resided in one or many.

And in the very teeth of that assertion, so true, so wisely and profoundly true, the Senator from Texas proposes, aided by the Senator from New York, to come into this body and vest arbitrary power with the majority of this body to change the rules at their own caprice and will Therefore, to prevent those who were chosen to be lawmakers from becoming lawbreakers, they prescribed in all the constitutions boundaries beyond which they should not go. All these were useless precautions if majorities were not sometimes maddened by the just of power and forgetful of the rights of the weaker party. In all these constitutions we see where the people, jealous for the preservation of their natural rights, have prohibited the government from interfering with the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, etc.

Further on the Senator says:

The demand for the removal of the limitations in the rules means that the party in power are fatally bent on mischief; that they have some desperate enterprise on foot that their prophetic souls tell them is beyond the boundary of rightful jurisdiction, and that incarrying it out they will meet with stub-

"The party in power are fatally bent on mischief; they have some desperate enterprise on foot that their prophetic souls tell

Has the majority in this body some desperate enterprise on foot that their prophetic souls tell them is beyond the boundary of rightful jurisdiction."

Has the majority in this body some desperate enterprise on foot that they want to pass through this body which excuses that Senator for violating the sound dectrine he has there laid down, without notice, so far as I have been able to determine, to rise in his seat and introduce an amendment to the rules, invoke the Presiding Officer of this body to violate his oath, and pass it nolens volens because he has the brute power to do it? That seems to be about the situation, Mr. President.

But that is not all the Senator says in this excellent article.

He proceeds:

The excesses which they will attempt will be such at are dictated by a conviction of party necessity. The measures for which the way must be cleared are such as will, in their judgment, secure party ascendency. If it can be done, the rules will be so framed that all opposition will be silenced when they are ready to vacate a Democratic seat and give it to a Republican contestant, regardless of the vote of the constituency. And there will be no "scandalous scenes" when they are trying to pass bills to create returning boards to give certificates of election to defeated Republican candidates for electors and members of Congress. It is to prepare the way for the advent of this higher civilization that the rules have been indicted and arraigned before the bar of public opinion.

Then he gives a history of some of the proceedings of that body in unseating several members of Congress, two from my own State:

While these resolutions unseating the Democratic Representatives were before the House, the minority indulged in parliamentary tactics to defeat them, and the country can decide whether the scandal attached to the majority, who were engaged in an effort to rob the constituencies of three districts of the right of representation, or the minority, who were engaged in defending them. .

Democrats ought not to be too severely criticised by their opponents for employing filibustering tactics, for the lesson was learned from the Republicans.

Then the distinguished writer gives a history of the Kansas-Nebraska bill against which the Republicans filibustered, and of the consideration and passage of the civil-rights bill. He says:

In 1857 there was another notable struggle by the minority to prevent the theft of the Presidency. An act of Congress was passed to change the existing rule for counting the electoral vote. A complission was created to lift the contest out of the murky atmosphere of politics, and into a higher and purer atmosphere of patriotism. But it was found that politics, and not patriotism, controlled the decisions of the commission, and that it was organized to avoid the obstructions that would otherwise have embarrassed the way to the Executive chair.

The Republicans again have a majority in the House, but not large enough to insure the success of their schemes. They have again extraordinary measures to be carried through, and the rules must again be subjected to their manipulations. They have gotten up seventeen contests for Democratic seats.

Then he says:

There was a thorough revision of the rules of the House in 1879. The committee charged with the duty of overhauling the rules reported numerous amendments, all of which had the unanimous agreement of the whole. The gag, of course, was left out, as it had been taken out by the Democratic House in the previous Congress, and not being in accord with the canons of Democratic faith, it was never restored in any of the Houses when they were in the majority.

The gag was left out in the revision of the rules in the other House on that occasion, but the Senator proposes in this body to apply the gag by not permitting the minority to open their mouths when he and his friends desire to change the rules in order to pass this or any other me sure.

Then he concludes this most excellent article, sound in every respect, according to my judgment, as follows:

The measure they propo

That is the Republican House of Representatives-is bold and revolutionary, and it remains to be seen whether they will succeed in passing it, and, if it is passed, what the popular verdict will be when it comes to be enforced.

That is a part of the record made by the honorable Senator on this question. That was in 1889. On a more recent occasion in the House of Representatives, on February 10, 1890, the honorable Senator delivered a very spirited, able, sound argument against the very measure which he is now proposing that the Senate shall adopt. Among other things, he said:

Senate shail adopt. Among other things, he said:

Mr. Mills. Mr. Speaker, the code of rules which the majority of the committee have reported to the House for its adoption is a new departure in parliamentary law. It is a proposition to reverse the legislative engine and to run back on the track upon which we have been running forward for a whole century. It is a code based upon a newly discovered idea, that in this country minorities have no rights, and that majorities are all powerful, that they speak by inspiration, that their utterances are infallible and their actions impeccable. It is the resurrection of the old, exploded idea of centuries ago that the king is the divinely appointed agent of the Almighty, and of course "the king can do no wrong."

Then ofter quoting from the Declaration of Indexes here the law of the law of the course in the law of the course in the law of the law of

Then, after quoting from the Declaration of Independence, he

How are these rights to be secured? Certainly not by subjecting them all to the caprice and whim of a majority. Oh. no; our fathers never means to do anything of that sort. Why, sir, they knew that power when vested either in a million of people or in one man, without any limit upon its exercise, is a tyrant. Hence our Government is a government of checks and balances. It is a government of limitations, delegations, and prohibitions.

Then, further on, the distinguished Senator said:

Yes, Mr. Speaker, majorities within their limits as defined by the Constitution are supreme. That ought to be satisfactory. But there are some powers that our fathers thought it dangerous for majorities to have, and they said that majorities should not have them. They put majorities under the ban of suspicion. They surrounded them with limitations. They directed the vigilant and watchful eye of the citizen on all their movements.

Again, he said:

Here, sir, is one place where the minority is superior to the majority. majority can create a navy, but it can not create a military commission to try any citizen in time of peace. A majority can close our ports, but it can not close our mouths. Free speech is one of the rights which is safely secured within the bolts and bars of the Constitution; it is far beyond the reach of the strong arm of the majority. .

They said in many things majorities should be supreme, and in many others that minorities should be supreme.

Then, again, the Senator said:

But. Mr. Speaker, it is not only in our national Constitution we see these limitations thrown around majorities. It is so in every State constitution in the Union. What is it for? It is to protect the minority; that is what it is for. It is a check to the madness of the majority or its caprice, or its wantonness, to use the word employed by Mr. Jefferson. It is to take away from it that power which all history shows it has so grossly abused.

Further on the distinguished Senator said:

Further on the distinguished Senator said:

The rules prescribed under the power conferred by the Constitution of the United States are for the protection of the minority, and they have done it from the foundation of the Government. That is one of the objects of making rules. It is not alone to facilitate business. Of course rules are intended to secure the orderly procedure of the business of this body, but at the same time they are intended to cause the House to halt, to pause, to reflect, and in some instance, where it may become necessary, to go back and inquire of the sober second thought of the people again. It is on the sober second thought of the people one Government rests. The people themselves may become mad. They may become wanton with power, and the very security of our free institutions rests on the fact that the sober second thought, in the language of one of our illustrious forefathers, will bring them back to a sense of their duty to their fellow-citizens and themselves, and thus preserve the blessings of free government for themselves and their posterity.

Mr. Speaker, what we have done on this side of the House was simply to call the attention of the people of the United States to the fact that the majority in this House had broken the bounds assigned to it by the Constitution of the United States, and that it was ravening like a wolf in the fold at night, that it was coming into the House in defiance of the constitutional mandate to make rules for the government of its procedure—rules for the protection of the minority as well as rules for the expression of the will of the majority in the prosecution of the business before the House.

So, I might continue to read, all in the line of the sentiments thus so forcibly and eloquently expressed. In three years from that time, to-day, in this body, the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New York propose to override the limitations and restrictions which the Constitution places upon the majorities, and to railroad through this body a motion to change the rules as they say, to enable the Senate to transact business. It will never be done with my consent. I recognize the rights of majorities to express their verdict in a constitutional manner; no man more readily does than myself.

The Senator from New York propounded a question to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] awhile ago, and asked him when we could get to a vote with 20 Senators obstructing and opposing it. I will tell the Senator when we can get to a vote; I will tell that Senator now when we can get to a vote. If this majority, from which he proposes to take the bridle of restraint, will do as the founders of this Government did when it was organized and formed, formed for future generations, compromise the differences between the majority and the minority of this body, then a vote can be had.

Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Possibly the majority might be a little obstinate; sometimes majorities are, as well as minorities; and they might not desire compromise. What then?

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. President, it is the highest evidence to my mind that the bill ought not to pass, if that is the case, particularly when the Senator has announced that he proposes, if he can get assistance in this body, to remove the restraint from that majority and pass the bili over the rules, Constitution, laws, rights, and every other consideration which has controlled the deliberations of this body. I say if that majority is actuated by such motives and from such a consideration as that, the bill ought not to pass until, as was suggested by the Senator from Texas in his speech in the other House, we have had the opportunity of appealing to the judgment and verdict of the American people upon the subject. That is my position.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?
Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.
Mr. HILL. The question of the amendment of the rules is one thing: the question which the Senator was going to answer, as I understood him, was the question I had propounded to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]; which was, if the majority of this Senate desire to pass the pending bill, which they think is a wise bill, demanded by the best interests of the country, I ked the Senator to point out how the majority is to pass bill under the existing rules, provided the minority do not want them to pass it? I should like to hear a frank, plain, explicit answer to that question, and not a general reference to the Constitution, rules, and matters of that kind.

Mr. BUTLER. I will give the Senator from New York a di-Mr. BUTLER. I will give the Senator from New York a direct answer, and thought I had done so. When the majority finds itself in that condition in this body, with a strong, determined, sincere, anxious minority, the way to pass a bill is to make some concession to that minority. If that is not done, the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. HILL. Then, I understand, if the Senator will indulge me a little further, that it is not the majority which passes bills in this body, and the bills passed do not reflect the sentiments of the majority, but they reflect the sentiments of the minority?
Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. And therefore the plain doctrine, enunciated by Mr. HILL. And therefore the plain doctrine, enunciated by the Senator now for the first time, is that the majority can not pass bills they want to pass, but that they must always compromise with the minority. I do not believe in any such doctrine. Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no, Mr. President, the Senator from New York has made a side issue, and he begs the question when he says that the majority here never pass a bill through this body without the consent of the minority.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will indulge me a moment I shall

If the Senator will indulge me a moment, I shall Mr. HILL. not interrupt him further, I think. I understood him to say-I am not so far off, I think, that I did not correctly understand him—that if the majority desired to pass a bill under those circumstances and refused to compromise, then he said that the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. BUTLER. And I repeat it, Mr. President.
Mr. HILL. And there I take issue with the Senator.
Mr. BUTLER. I repeat it, and I have no apologies to make for it; and I repeat to the Senator what I said the other day, that seven-tenths, I think nine-tenths, of the measures which become laws in this country are the results of compromise. Does the Senator pretend to say that because the rights of the minority are recognized in a measure, it does not express the judgment of the majority? Is that the position I understand the Senator from New York to take?

Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator want at answer?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. HILL. I should not interrupt the Senator otherwise.
Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to interruption, for I want to state my position, and I wish to hear the

Mr. HILL. My position is—and I submit that it is the correct position under our form of government—that the minority have the right to express their views, have a right to endeavor to impress their views upon the majority, but if the majority in their ignorance, in their wisdom, in their obstinacy, or in their foolishness desire to reject the views of the minority, they have a right to do it. I say that I can not find anything in the Content of the University of the University of the Content of the University o stitution of the United States which says that a minority of the United States Senate can pass a bill. [Applause in the galleries.

Mr. BUTLER. Nor I, Mr. President.

Mr. HULL. If there is such a provision let it be pointed out.
Mr. BUTLER. I have made no such statement. I have not I have not stated that a minority could pass a bill; I have stated, what I repeat, that a minority is clothed by the Constitution and the rules made in pursuance of it, with the right to prevent the passage of obnoxious measures; and when the majority has expressed itself in a constitutional way in accordance with the rules, then, I submit, it has the power and the right to pass measures. ures; and not till then.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina

a question? Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

PALMER. Let me ask the Senator does he believe the majority have a right to vote on a measure?
Mr. BUTLER. It depends on how the majority behave themselves whether they have a right to do it or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. When it does?

Mr. PALMER. When it does?
Mr. BUTLER. Then I think they have a right to vote.

Mr. PALMER. Do I understand the Senator that the majority must accede to the demands of the minority before they can

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, they can vote. We have been voting here all the time. Mr. PALMER.

On the main question?

We have been voting here for the last two Mr. BUTLER. months on some question.

Mr. PALMER. Oh. yes; but on the main question. Can I, as a Senator from Illinois, be allowed to vote for repeal?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator must answer that question for himself. I do not control the Senator's vote. I say to the Senator when you want to receive the page of the receive when you want to receive the page of the receive when you want to receive the page of the receive when you want to receive the page of the receive when you want to receive the page of the receive the page of the receive the receiver the tor that he has a right to vote whenever we reach a vote under the rules
Mr. PALMER. Whenever I get an opportunity?

Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. PALMER.
When can I have the opportunity?
Mr. BUTLER.
When debate is exhausted.

Mr. BUTLER.

I may not be with the majority, but does the Mr. PALMER. Senator mean to say that I can have a right to vote only when the minority conclude to concede it to me?

Mr. BUTLER. Whenever the debate is concluded and the minority think they have had ample time to debate the question, I take it for granted the Senator from Illinois will have the right to vote. I have no control over his vote. I only control my

Mr. PALMER. Until the minority conclude that I may vote,

I can not.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; you can not vote, because the rule gives the right of debate.

Mr. PALMER. That is the Senator's interpretation of the rule, that until the minority conclude that the majority may vote, they can not vote?

Mr. BUTLER. When debate under the rule is exhausted, of course you have a right to vote.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the Senator to say that the interpretation of the rule of the Senate is, that until the minority onsent the majority can not vote?

Mr. BUTLER. Now let meask the Senator a question. Does he not admit that the rule as now existing in our code of rules gives the minority unlimited power of debate?

Mr. PALMER. No.
Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator denies that the rules under which we are acting do not give the minority unlimited power of debate, then, of course, the controversy between the Senator and myself is ended.

Mr. PALMER. May I be allowed to make a statement? I believe that in all discussion before this body the minority have the right in good faith to exercise the right of free debate, but when minorities maintain the right to debate for the sake of exhausting time I deny that right.

Mr. BUTLER. Nobody has done that.

Mr. PALMER. It has been claimed here.

Mr. BUTLER. Nobody has done that.

Nobody has done that. There has been what may be called obstruc-Mr. PALMER. tive debate.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a matter of opinion. Who is to determine whether I am obstructing now or not?
Mr. PALMER. May I answer the question?
Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. First, the Senator himself; secondly, the majority of this body. [Applause in the galleries.]
Mr. BUTLER. I did not hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. PALMER. I said, first, the Senator himself, under his

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will state his point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. It is in gross violation of the rules of the body for the galleries to make any expression of approval or disapproval of what is occurring on this floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee enter a motion to have the galleries cleared?

Mr. HARRIS. I will demand it, if the offense is again repeated; but not now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair takes this occasion to state to the occupants of the galleries that if the offense again occurs, upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, the galleries will be cleared. The Chair has more than once called the attention of the occupants of the galleries to the fact that any manifestation of approval or disapproval is a violation of the

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to add that it does not require a mo-tion, but it is one of the duties of the Chair, independent of a motion, to warn the galleries, and to order them cleared with-motion, to warn the galleries, and to order them cleared without motion if the offense is repeated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, the Chair announces that upon a repetition of this offense the Chair will order the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am perfectly well aware that under the rules of this body, which the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas are so ready to trample on, to cast aside and discard, and convert this Senate into a town meeting—
I am perfectly well aware that it is one of the provisions of that code of rules that no applause shall be allowed in the galleries; and if I have been the means, while nobody applauds me, if the friends of the Senator from New York have gathered here for the purpose of expressing their approbation of his methods I should be very glad, Mr. President, to invite that Senator out upon some street corner, where he and I can have it out before

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for the enforcement of the rule.
The Senator who is called to order must sit down, and he can not proceed without leave of the Senate.

Does the Senator call me to order? Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. MANDERSON. Ido. Mr. BUTLER. Very well Very well

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the words as spoken be read by the Reporter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The words will be read.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am perfectly well aware that under the rules of this body, which the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas are soready to trample on, to castaside and discard, and convert this Senate into a town meeting—I am perfectly well aware that it is one of the provisions of that code of rules that no applause shall be allowed in thegal heries; and if I have been the means, while nobody applauds me, if the friends of the Senator from New York have gathered here for the purpose of expressing their approbation of his methods, I should be very glad, Mr. President, to invite that Senator out upon some street corner, where he and I can have it out before the masses.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I have simply this to say. I realize, in the heat of discussion, that much is said which should not be said. This debate for the last few days has been characterized by a degree of personalities unbecoming to the Senators who have used the personalities and not befitting this Chamber. I think all that is necessary is that, in a cool moment, the Senator from South Carolina shall hear a repetition of the words used by him, and he will see, upon a moment's reflection, that they by him, and he will see, upon a moment's reflection, that they are hardly fit for this presence.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I must confess—

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senator from South Carolina be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. MANDERSON. I second the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. This is like a thunderclap. I do not know exactly how to proceed if I am to be hauled up on a short turn, as I was a while ago by the Senator from Nebraska. I was as unconscious as a man ever was in his life of violating any rule of order of the Senate. What I said to the Senator from New York was said playfully. I take it for granted that he so understood it.

Mr. HILL. I certainly understood that the Senator was speak-

Mr. HILL. I certainly understood that the Senator was speaking, as he sometimes does, in a Pickwickian, sense.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a better expression. But it seems to have struck everybody around me, and the Senator from Nebraska rises with the utmost solemnity and dignity and coolness and hauls me over the coals. Of course, I am very much obliged to that Senator when he thinks I am going wrong that he should experies the position of a set of obliged to that Senator when he thinks I am going wrong that he should exercise the position of a sort of censor morem over me; but I must confess I was taken entirely by surprise to have it supposed that I had ever violated any rules of the Senate. It has never been my habit, it is not now, to make personal allusions unless some Senator sees fit to attack me. Nothing was further from my purpose than to say anything that was unkind or unpleasant to the Senator from New York.

As he expresses it, it was said in a Pickwickian sense. The Senate seems to be getting into a very serious mood after having Senate seems to be getting into a very serious mood after having been in a very hilarious one in the gallery; and I simply wanted to keep up that feeling, if possible. As my friend from Arkansas Mr. BERRY] suggests to me, I meant to speak on the corner, not to fight. I had no idea of inviting the Senator from New York out on the corner for the purpose of doing anything else except indulging in a little legitimate stump-speaking; that was all; and as the galleries were applauding, I thought I would give them a wider range, where they could hear the Senator better.

But, Mr. President, I think this is one of the results of the proposition of the Senator from New York himself and of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HILL. What proposition?

Mr. BUTLER. This performance here in the Senate. I think it is one of the natural and necessary results of the prop-I am perfectly well aware that it is one of the provisions of that osition of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New York that the majority shall change the rules of this body without regard to the mode or method by which they shall be changed. It seems to me that way. Clothe the majority with power, unrestrained, unlimited, unbridled power, and you will have a town meeting or a mass meeting here at any time you

Mr. PUGH. Or a despotism.
Mr. BUTLER. Or a despotism, because the history of mankind proves that power is always aggressive and never latisfied, except it is accumulating more and more.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a ques tion, and I should like to ask the venerable Senator from Illinois a question—one at a time. How do they propose to get around the difficulty which they say is confronting us to-day? I should like to have an answer from the Senator from New York first.

Mr. HILL. Let us first ascertain what the difficulty is.

Mr. BUTLER. The difficulty, I understand, complained of by the Senator from New York is because we can not get a vote. That I understand is the complaint made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois. Now, I should like the Senator to tell me how he proposes to get around that difficulty and get to a vote. culty and get to a vote.

Mr. HILL. In the first place, to answer the Senator from South Carolina, we must ascertain what the difficulty is.
Mr. BUTLER. Well, I leave that to the Senator.

Mr. HILL. The difficulty, I understand, is that by reason of the imperfection, the weakness, the omission, and, as I think, the unconstitutionality of existing rules, with the minority act-ing as now, and as they assert they propose to act, it is utterly impossible for the majority to carry out the constitutional provision which requires them to legislate, and that, therefore, these rules are just as defective, just as unconstitutional in practical substance and effect as though they had in their very terms provided that the rules should never be changed without the consent of the minority.

That is the difficulty that confronts us, and I am free to say unless the minority retreat from their position, unless the minority consent that we may vote, if they continue in the attitude they have now assumed and threaten to continue, we can not pass the pending bill or any other bill that the people demand.

That is the difficulty. Now the remedy. I argued the other day, sir, that it was always the right under the Constitution for the Senate (and when I speak of the Senate I speak of the majority of the Senate, of course) to make rules. The right is conferred by the terms of the Constitution. In that same Constitution, which gives the majority the right to make rules, is con-

the right and the responsibility of legislation. We have the power to make the rules; we are required to legislate. In order to carry out those two purposes I go further and say, the power to make the rules implies the power to change them; and whenever the majority of this body discover that it is utterly impossible for them to legislate without a change of the rules, they have the constitutional right to so change the rules as to enable them to legislate. The difficulty? There is no difficulty, sir, in carrying out this constitutional provision.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will allow me right there, because he and I are together up to that point—

Mr. HILL. I am very glad to hear it.
Mr. BUTLER. Nobody has denied, I have not, the right of the Senate to change its rules. Nobody has denied that. It has been done over and over again in this body and the other. The point I would like the Senator-

Mr. HILL. I understand the Senator thinks the majority have a right to change the rules without the consent of the minority

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I am coming to.
Mr. HILL. That is the point. The Senator is very near right to that point.

Mr. BUTLER. I admit the right of the majority to change the rules. Nobody denies the right.

Mr. HILL. It seems to me that is the remedy for the whole difficulty.

Mr. BUTLER. Nobody denies the right of the Senate to change its rules; but the point where the Senator and I part company is as to the manuer of changing those rules. I under-stood the Senator to say that the majority could get up and by simple resolution at any moment change the rules.

derstand that to be his position?

Mr. HILL. The precise hour, form, and manner of offering the resolution will be determined when the majority conclude to amend the rules. The Senator need not be impatient.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, Mr. President, that is not the question.

The Senator has not answered the question. I asked him if in proceeding to amend those rules he would be guided by the prothe code of rules under which we are governed? is the point I should like him to answer.

Mr. HILL. I insist upon it that any restriction in those rules whereby the majority are deprived of the power of making an amendment is not binding upon the Senate, because other the rules might bind the Senate so that it would be impossible to change them. In other words, my position is simply this: that whether the rules say directly that the majority shall control the amendment of the rules or whether by other provisions they permit the minority to prevent an amendment, it amounts to the same thing and has the same effect.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the position of the Senator is about this: that the rules bind the minority but do not bind or control the majority. Is that the position?

Mr. HILL. That is not the position.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be glad to have the matter explained,

Mr. HILL. As I stated yesterday, and I repeat it for the information of the Senator, upon all ordinary methods of procedure they are binding upon both. In reference to the power of amendment, we can not tie ourselves up so that the majority have not the power to amend the rules.

Mr. BUTLER. But, if the Senator will pardon me, we have tied ourselves up by a code of rules to which the Senator subscribed when he took the oath as a Senator of the United States. Now, I understand the Senator to say that he is not bound by that code of rules except in so far as it may meet his approba-

Mr. HILL. If we have, as the Senator says, tied ourselves up so that we can not change them, then I propose to untie the rules so that we may be permitted to change them.

Mr. BUTLER. How, Mr. President?
Mr. HILL. By simply presenting at the proper time and hour and place and occasion, to be determined by the majority, an amendment to our rules, and then proceeding as regulated by the majority to vote upon it. There is no practical difficulty if the majority of the Senate desire to change the rules.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator, in proceeding to change those rules, would disregard Rule XL?

Mr. HILL. What is Rule XL?

Mr. BUTLER. Rule XL reads:

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unant-mous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule

Do I understand the Senator from New York to say that in proceeding to amend the rules he would ignore the provision of

Mr. HILL. That rule is very easily complied with; and I should prefer, and have already given notice of, an amendment under the strict terms of that rule.

Then I understand the Senator to say that he Mr. BUTLER. would not consent to amend the rules except as provided in the code of rules itself.

Mr. HILL. I have not said that. I said I have thus far proceeded under the strict letter of the rules. What position the majority should take upon this question, if a majority desire to change the rules, will depend in my judgment very much upon the attitude of the minority.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that he will not be bound by the code of rules in proceedings to amend them; but, as I understand him, he would amend the rules according to the will of the majority at any hour of the day, as many hours as we sit here, at any day of the week, in any week of the year, by the will of the majority.

Mr. HILL. I have said that the power to amend the rules is a constitutional right, and it overrides any particular rule here which in any manner restricts or limits it. But the majority have a right to proceed under the rules, if they see fit or desire to do so, and unquestionably the majority would proceed, as we have proceeded thus far, strictly under the very rule mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not asking what the majority would do;

Mr. Bol Lich. I am not asking what the higherly would do?

Mr. HILL. I hope, sir, that I am one of the majority. I assume only to speak for myself. I hope that before this debate is through a majority will be found by my side ready to insist upon the constitutional right to amend the rules, whereby we can carry out the provision of the Constitution which vests in the majority, and not in the minority, the power of legislation.

Mr. BUTLER. To that proceeding there would be no objection-not the slightest.

Mr. HILL. Then we agree.
Mr. BUTLER. I have finally got the Senator down to the point, which was rather difficult to do I confess. If he will proceed in that way, if he will proceed in the manner provided in the rules themselves, he will find that the minority will meet him on those rules, frankly, freely, honestly. Nobody here, I repeat, has denied the right of the majority of this body to change its rules. A man who would deny it would fly in the face of history. They have been changed and modified over and over again, and perhaps will be as long as this is a deliberative body. The other House of Congress are amending their rules from

The other House of Congress are amending their rules from time to time, but they do it in an orderly, constitutional, regular, lawful way, and no parliamentary body that I have heard under a popular government has ever clothed a naked, unbridled majority with the right to amend its rules or transact any other

Mr. HILL. In order that we may understand each other further, and possibly better, does the Senator claim the right of unlimited debate on every amendment of the rules: I claim no right except that which is given

Mr. BUTLER. me by the Constitution and rules themselves.

Mr. HILL. That statement is pretty general.
Mr. BUTLER. If the rules give me the right to unlimited debate, and my conscience and my judgment and my duty to my constituents justify me in conducting that unlimited debate, I shall proceed to exercise that right.

Mr. HILL. Can not the Senator answer it in any other way? He prefers not to answer in any other way. I was simply going to suggest how can the majority amend the rules, although given power under the Constitution to amend the rules, if the minority are to enjoy the right of unlimited debate upon the very question involved?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, we would rely upon the persussive powers and eloquence of the Senator from New York.
Mr. HILL. I fear that would not be sufficient to induce the minority to amend the rules.

Mr. BUTLER. We would rely upon that to convince us. Mr. STEWART. We expect to convince him before we get

Mr. BUTLER. I am not so sure about that. The Senator from Nevada says we expect to convince the Senator from New York before we get through.

Mr. STEWART. He has taken our side of the question in half of his speeches.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very glad to hear that. I think we are making progress with the Senator from New York.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly, he is on the fence.

Mr. BUTLER. I think he is a little over on our side, and when the persuasive eloquence of my friend from Nevada shall have a little further sway, I think the Senator from New York will drop entirely on our side of the fence.

Mr. STEWART. I think so, too.

Mr. BUTLER. I think perhaps if the New York election was over he would come over to our side. I do not know about that.

over he would come over to our side. I do not know about that, but I am inclined to think that would have some influence and I am not saying that reproachfully at all.

Mr. HILL. I can not hear the Senator.
Mr. BUTLER. I will not repeat it; it is a little badinage.
Now, Mr. President, returning to the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who, I am sorry to say, is not here, he treated us yesterday evening to a most graphic—

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator proceeds to that new point, Ishould like to ask him a practical question to get at his views,

if there be no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolinia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts? Mr. BUTLER. Of course, Mr. President.

The rule at present provides that for the morning hour, which is two hours, only certain topics shall be taken up, except by unanimous consent; which very easily may, if any-body chooses to debate them, always fill up the morning hour.

Now, suppose an outgoing political majority just before the 4th of March should extend that rule to the entire day, and should leave behind them a certain calendar, as they would have the right to do, by having a rule that the Senate is always the same body; and they provide that only the subject prescribed in that calendar should be taken up in the entire day except by unanimous consent. They give place on the 4th of March, under the new elections of the third of this body, to a majority of another political faith. Under such a rule, constitutionally adopted, that majority can never proceed to take up or consider the great measures which the people expected to be accomplished when they changed the political power in the country.

Now then, they set themselves to amend that rule, and under the rule two Senators may divide the twenty-four hours between them. One of them may move for an adjournment and have the Presiding Officer count the Senate on it, and then alternate a motion for a recess, and spend twelve hours in that way. The other may take his place and spend the other twelve hours.

That method of proceeding being in perfect accord with the rules of this body would prevent forever, at the will of two men alone, the body from changing by reason of the new majority which has come in.

Now, does the Senator hold that there is no power in this body to prevent that thing? You can not prevent it by changing the rules according to the rules, because you can never get a vote to do it, and therefore no political change of opinion and of power can take place in the Senate until every State has changed its Senator. I ask the Senator if his logic does not bring him to that position, and if he accepts that position.

Mr. BUTLER. No, Mr. President, I think not. Of course the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator can propound what appears to me (and I say it without any disrespect to him) a very absurd proposition. Mr. HOAR. It is not.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the way it strikes me. Of course we can always suppose an extreme case, and the one proposed by the Senator is an extreme case. The general rule of law is, I believe, that all public officials are going to discharge their duty according to law. The presumption is in favor of this body changing its rules in accordance with the principles of common sense and common justice, and in the discharge of the public business. The Senator might get up and ask me a great many wery extreme questions which would have no relevancy.

Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does the Senator from Massachusetts hold that this body can change its rules except in accordance with the code of rules itself?

Mr. HOAR. I do.
Mr. BUTLER. You do?
Mr. HOAR. I do.
Mr. BUTLER. In what manner?
Mr. HOAR. I will state it if the Sepator wants me to do it. Before stating it, however, I should like to add only one sentence to what I have just said. Although I have put an extreme case, it is no more extreme than that which confronts this body at the present moment, when a Senator who half a minute ago was in his seat said to a majority of the Senate, "You know you can, not pass this bill," not meaning—no human being who heard him understood him to mean—that he knew the minority would persuade and change the majority. We all understood him to mean that we know there is no constitutional way in which the majority, desiring to pass the bill, could do it.

Now, then, I answer the Senator's question. I will answer it with great pleasure. I say that if there were a motion made to change these rules, which tie up and prevent the American people from changing the political policies of this country at the will of the minority, and that motion were presented to the Presiding Officer after the debate, or after motions to adjourn and take a recess, or the call of a quorum, or whatever motion, usually called filibustering, had gone so far in the opinion of the constitutional Presiding Officer of this body, who is chosen by the American people and not by the Senate, and has his duty prescribed for him by the Constitution fundamentally in the beginning-I say when it had reached the point which implied to his mind that the further discussion was intended to prevent action, it would be in his power and would be his duty to say to the Senate, "Shall I put this question without further debate or dilatory motion?" and thereupon to direct the yeas and nays to be called, permitting nothing to interfere, and if a majority of the Senate say "aye" it would be his duty to put that question.

perinting nothing to the prescribe rules, it is true, but there is a rule beside that we prescribe, and that was prescribed by us, by our masters, the American people, when they enacted their Constitution. That is a rule above, below, around, within every rule that the Senate has adopted; and the great officer who sits in that chair would, in my judgment, be bound, as the Speaker did in the other House, to obey its supreme behest.

Mr. BUTLER. In other words, Mr. President, that is a reaffirmation of the higher-law doctrine, as I understand it.

Mr. HOAR. Constitutional. It is a higher law thus to some people than the law they practice on.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Massachusetts had better Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Massachusetts had better keep his temper, because I have been very amiable while he has interrupted me, and there is no need for him to fly—
Mr. HOAR. If my friend will permit me, having preserved, if I give up my own temper I shall not take his in exchange

Mr. BUTLER. Let the Senator preserve his own temper now, and we will proceed amiably about this matter. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sanate will be in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I say in my judgment the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is a reaffirmation of the higher-law doctrine. That is my judgment. Of course, I take it, the Senator, with his views, will give me the right to have my own opinions without subjecting myself to his animadversions.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that in a certain contin-The Senator from Massachusetts says that in a certain contingency which he has stated it would be the duty of the Presiding Officer of this body, upon a motion, to cut off debate, and that he alone shall be the judge as to when the minority have sufficiently discussed the question pending.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to apologize to the Senator from South Carolina for the fact that I shall be obliged to absent myself are the Senator for a little while and the I can be senatored.

from the Senate for a little while and that I can not remain and hear what undoubtedly will be a very eloquent answer.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very sorry that the Senator is going away. Of course he is entirely excusable, as he has explained to me; and the entente cordiale has been entirely restored between

As I understand the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, it is that when a majority of this body determines that a rule ought to be changed, some member of the majority may make a motion that debate shall be concluded, and thereupon it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to declare the debate ended.

Now, Mr. President, where would that place a minority? A majority of one of the great parties of this country is in control of the Senate. The Presiding Officer of this body is in political accord with that majority, and the minority are turned the tender mercies of the majority and that partisan Presiding Officer. Is that the position in which the Senator from Massachusetts and those who think with him, would place the minority?

I scarcely think so, Mr. President.
In the Government of Great Britain that has never been done.
They adopted cloture in the House of Commons after a long and bitter contest by the minority; but the Speaker of the House of Commons is a nonpartisan. He is put there to protect the minority in their right of debate, and he will decline to close a debate when in his opinion the majority are acting in a wanton

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question to ascertain a fact? Does there reside me to ask him a question to ascertain a fact? Does there reside a power anywhere in this body under the rules to declare when debate has closed and the Senate shall proceed to vote?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think there does; and as much respect as I have for the patriotism of my party friend who presides over this Chamber to-day, as fair and impartial and as patriotic as I believe him to be, I would resistany effort to make him the depository of the power to say when debate shall terminate in this body. I would resist it with my party in the majority, because I believe it would be subversive of the very foundation principles upon which this Government is built and framed.

It is a very different thing in the British House of Commons, where the Speaker of the House is a nonpartisan. He is put there to protect the minority, the idea being that the majority is able to take care of itself, which is true. But what earthly chance would a minority have with the majority of one party and the Presiding Officer of the same party to carry through party measures?

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator from South Carolina, with his permission, whether he thinks the method of selecting the presiding officer of the British House of Commons is superior to the method by which the Presiding Officer of this body is se-

Mr. BUTLER. I am not discussing that point. It has not the slighest reference to what I am saying. That would open a door of discussion which I do not propose to go into with the Senator from Kentucky. I am stating a fact, and when he denies the fact, I will then talk to him about it. The speaker of the British House of Commons is a nonpartisan. It is so understand that the is not there for the appropriate that the second that he is not there for the appropriate that the second that he is not there for the appropriate that the second that he is not there for the appropriate that the second that he is not there for the appropriate that the second that the second that there is not the second that the second that there is not the second that there is not the second that there is not the second that the sec stood; and it is understood that he is put there for the purpose of protecting the minority. What protection would a minority have in this body with a presiding officer and the majority of one party? Sir, I would never consent to it. Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; two, if necessary.
Mr. ALDRICH. Pending a proposition to amend the rules of this body, who is to decide when the conclusion of the debate is to be reached?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senate decides for itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. Who are the Senate?

Mr. BUTLER. It is this body, sitting around here. The Senator is a part of it, and he has a right to his opinion as well as I have to mine as to how long he should talk.

Mr. ALDRICH. But how am I to express my opinion if the minority of the Senate, or those who differ with me, conclude to continue discussion indefinitely?

The Senator from Rhode Island is not afflicted with such an amount of modesty that he can not get in whenever he chooses. He is not overwhelmed with modesty.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg pardon; it is not a question of modesty.

Mr. BUTLER. It is, because the Senator can get the floor at almost any time he chooses.

almost any time he chooses.

Mr. ALDRICH. I can get the floor for the purpose of talking, but not for the purpose of voting, I am sorry to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Then somebody else wants to talk. [Laughter.] After the Senator has uttered his eloquent phrases and electrified this body and the galleries with his powers of eloquence he ought to give some other Senator an opportunity to express himself in a feeble way, I should think.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that is a fair answer to my question?

Mr. BUTLER. 1 think I have answered it. The Senator asked me who is to judge when a motion is under discussion to amend the rules, when the debate shall end; I say the Senate itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that, if the Senator will pardon me, is just what I say, and I say the Senate itself is a majority of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, then, let the majority determine it, but do not let the Presiding Officer do it. That is the point I make. I know very little about the rules of either body, I am very frank to say; but I understand that under their present system in the committee on Rules determine when debate other House the Committee on Rules determine when debate shall end and when a vote shall be taken. Is not that the case?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; the Committee on Rules bring in a proposition. The House itself must adopt it.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Rules does practically determine it. If the majority sustain the Committee on Rules, then the vote is taken?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; that is the case. Mr. BUTLER. That is the rule, I understand. Now, there is some sense and some reason in that procedure; but the idea of depositing that power in any one man appears to me to be monstrous, particularly in view of the conditions which I have stated

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not undertaken to be the representative here of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his absence, but I did not understand him to take the position that the Presiding Officer could determine the question, but that the Presiding Officer should submit the question to the Senate and let a majority of the Senate decide whether debate had proceeded a sufficient length of time.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to state the Presiding Officer should put the question and not recognize anybody for a dilatory motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; I think the Senator is mistaken about that

Mr. BUTLER. It was entirely upon that hypothesis I made my statement

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the Presiding Officer should submit to the Senate the question whether debate had proceeded at sufficient length, and upon a decision of the majority of the Senate that debate should close, then he should put the question without further dilatory motion.

Mr. BUTLER. The RECORD will speak for itself. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to make that statement. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] yes-Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] yesterday stated, and it has been stated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] to-day, and I believe by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], that the Senate is paralyzed; that the Government is paralyzed. The Senator from Texas stated that the Senate could not pass an appropriation bill. Why could not the Senate pass an appropriation bill? Has the Senator made an attempt to get one through this body? Has any Senator attempted it? Has any other measure than the one which is pending been suggested for the consideration of this body, except the motion to amend the Journal made by the Senator from Colorado, which we are now discussing?

we are now discussing?

How, then, is the Government paralyzed; because the majority can not have its way? Oh; no, Mr. President, this Government is not paralyzed.

I will not include the Senator from New York, because he has modified his proposition; but, if the proposition of the Senator from Texas should prevail, I tell him the Constitution of this Union will be paralyzed.

This Government did have a partial stroke of paralysis about thirty years ago, but in the course of four years it accumulated to itself more power than any government on the face of the earth, and it has more power to-day. If it had not had that gi-gantle power, such valiant warriors as the Senator from Texas and myself, perhaps, would not have been compelled to lay down our swords, but we did. It was the power the Government had accumulated around itself in four years, more gigantic and por-tentous then any ever held by any government when the face of tentous than any ever held by any government upon the face of the earth, and it is the strongest Government to-day on earth.

How, then, can it be said that the Government is paralyzed because one little measure can not get through the Senate as rapidly and as hurriedly as its impatient advocates demand of the minority? All this talk about the paralysis of the Government is to me, Mr. President—and I say it without disrespect absurd and ridiculous. This particular measure may be para-lyzed for the nonce, and it ought to be. If we proceed in accord-ance with what has been suggested here to-day, there will be a paralysis of the Constitution of this Union from which it will never recover.

But the Government is going on all the same. It is collecting its revenues; it is meeting its obligations; it is supporting its military and naval establishments; it is sustaining all the executive departments of the Government; and Congress yet lives, not-withstanding bill No. 1 from the House of Representatives is still on our table. I think we ought to hold our hands up to high Heaven and implore the great Giver of all good that we may survive notwithstanding House bill No. 1 has not yet passed.

The Senator from Texas said that he would grasp the hand of the Senator from Ohio on this measure. In his next breath he said that he was in favor of bimetallism or silver, but he rushes into the arms of the arch enemy of silver, and I do not say that disrespectfully or intending to be personal. He rushes into the arms of the arch enemy of silver, and oh, Mr. President, what a scene that would present to the American people, a scene fit for the gods and men to behold! The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Ohio embracing each other in a warm, cordial, voluptuous embrace! I would feel like exclaiming as the disconsolate Hamlet did when the ghost of his murdered father presented itself to him:

Angels and ministers of grace defend us!

What a picture it would make for the artist-the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Ohio embracing each other over the silver question! If that would not be an instance where extremes meet I do not know where we could find an illus-

And if we live long enough we shall behold another scene perhaps that would furnish a spectacle never before presented to the American people or to any people. When the election laws are reached, if the Government gets over its paralysis, and when a tariff bill for revenue only is reached, if it survives that paralysis, how the Senator from Texas will rush into the arms of the Senator from Ohio and embrace him again and again, and shake hands across the financial chasm!

Then he taunts those of us who vote with the venerable and distinguished Senator from Kansas with following the Populists; that "the Senator from Kansas, Mr. PEFFER," is the exponent of all the isms, of wild ideas; that he is a wild-eyed man, leading us astray; and the Senator from Texas says, de gustibus non est disputandum! That is true, Mr. President. He says, "politics makes strange bedfellows." There is no doubtabout that. But the strangest of all the political bedfellows this country has ever known will be the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Texas.

I say to the Senator from Texas that so long as the Senator from Kansas stands for the great tolling millions of this country against the money power I am his friend, and will stand by him. If I had to choose a file leader in the great political contest confronting us I would take the man for my leader who stands to his guns for the rights of the masses of this country against about ten or twelve men in the city of New York who can bring ruin and distress and destruction upon the country in ht. So, sir, I am not abashed at the taunt.
Mr. President, the age of wonders and surprises will not end with seeing me in the arms of the Senator from Kansas, and end with seeing me in the arms of the Senator from Kansas, and the Senator from Texas in the arms of the Senator from Ohio. We shall, I hope, live to see a long, fond, cordial, gushing embrace between the Senator from New York and the President of the United States. [Laughter.] That would be a picture for the artist. How long and lingering and loving it would be! A bucket of boiling hot water, Mr. President, could not separate

So the age of surprises has not passed, and I do not believe it will pass as long as this Congress is in session. We are going to have a great many such surprises. It would not surprise me to see my venerable friend from Nevada rush up to the White Houseand embrace the President. [Laughter.] Soatlast, whilst we have heard very direful predictions and prognostics about what is going to become of the country, that it is paralyzed, the Senate is paralyzed, the Government is paralyzed, I think as long as these love scenes continue there is no danger of a revolution or of the Government stopping. I regard them as very honeful store of the fever and the first of the fever of the first of the fever of the first of t hopeful signs of the future.

If the Senator from Texas will come as near getting over the fence on this rule question as the Senator from New York has done, I shall sleep much more profoundly and soundly than I other purposes."

have done since last Monday. I have no doubt he will, upon what he calls that sober second thought of the people. I have no doubt that he will not persist in a line which would destroy, as I believe it would destroy, the usefulness of this body, which would destroy its great underlying conservative principle, which has so long and so successfully and so ably sustained the burden imposed upon it by the Constitution and laws. Mr. President,

* * frather bear those evils we have, Than fly to others that we know not of.

If, after the excitement of this debate has subsided, a majority of this body shall deem it wise to modify its rules in a reasonable and conservative way, I do not know that I shall object; but the idea of attempting it now, with the heat of division and opposition burning in the minds of us all, would bring disuster, and, in my judgment, mortification and ultimately humiliation upon this Government. I would, therefore, counsel to be patient those who are manifesting so much impatience, demanding of me, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] has done over and over again, that I, one of eighty-five members of this body, shall say when a vote shall be taken, as though a man so insignificant as I should undertake to determine when a vote shall be taken.

I know that my venerable friend, I trust he will pardon me for calling him "my venerable friend," is the 1-st man in the United States who would take one single step toward disturbing that underlying conservative principle which has preserved our institutions so long. I know he is impatient for this debate to end, but not more so than I; and I think I have suggested a method by which it can be ended with entire regard for the rights, the feelings, the interests of every Senator upon this floor; and it can be done, Mr. President, without leaving a sting, as I said the other night, to be carried away from this Chamber to rankle in the bosom of any Senator.

It can be done with entire regard for the best interests of all the people, those who reside in the financial centers as well as those who inhabit the plains of the West and the broad fields of the South, where all can have recognition and protection ac-cording to their deserts, and according to the opinions of their representatives. It is with that, sir, and with nothing less than that shall I be satisfied; to nothing less will I consent.

There are millions and millions of people in this country, and I am one of them, who sincerely believe that the currency is too much contracted, or, if not too much contracted, is so distributed. uted as to bring hardship, ruin, loss, and unhappiness upon millions of the American people; and it is always wise statesmanship, Mr. President, it is to-day, and has always been since popular government was born upon the earth, to make reasonable concessions to a large body of people who sincerely believe in a particular line of policy.

Such concessions can be made without sacrifice of principle or without injury to anybody; and when some of our friends can relieve themselves of the conviction that they are politically infallible and concede that there are some other people who have political convictions and ideas as well as themselves-whenever we reach that point, my word for it, this question will be settled, and settled fairly and honorably.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1096) making a judgment a lien on all real estate or interest therein of the debtor in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1097) to admit to the mails as second-class matter periodical publications issued by or under the auspices of regularly incorporated benevolent and fraternal societies and orders and institutions of learning, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1098) granting an increase of pension to Winfield S. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1099) to refer the claims of George A. Eggleton and others to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs

He also introduced a bill (S. 1100) to grant an honorable dis-charge to William Morris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill S. 1101) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Daniel Merritt; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1102) to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S.1103) for the relief of Thomas J. Spencer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. MANDERSON. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana in charge of the repealing bill, I desire to give notice of an amendment to the rules and ask unanimous consent that it may be read

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read, in the absence of objection. The Secretary read as follows:

Amend Rule XII by inserting an additional clause, as follows:

"When upon a vote by yeas and mays it shall appear to the Chair upon recapitulation and before the announcement of the result that a quorum has not voted, he shall call upon Senators present who have not voted, by name, to vote, and shall direct the Secretary to add to the list of the Senators voting the names of the Senators present not voting, including those announcing pairs, or who may or may not be excused from voting, and to enter the same in the Journal; and fithe whole number constitute a quorum, and it shall appear that a majority of a quorum (or two-thirds) has voted on either side, the question shall be deemed to have been determined and the result shall be announced the same as if a quorum had voted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be ordered to be printed in the absence of objection.

W. L. HARDY AND OTHERS.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution: which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved. That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the present status of the claim of W. L. Hardy, John L. Carter, and William T. Holland against the Government of Spain for damages occasioned by their illegal arrest on board the brig Georgiana, of the coast of Yucatan, by a Spanish warship in May, 1850, and their subsequent imprisonment; what obstacles exist to the enforcement of said claim, and what action, if any, is needed to be taken by Congress in reference to the settlement of the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 3963) to amend sections 828, 833, 847, and 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to clerks' fees, semiannual returns of fees by district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, commissioners' fees, and to offenders against the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Sen-

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment re-

Mr. QUAY. I desire at this time to submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill, which I ask may he read

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance in line 26, after the word debte," by inserting the following:

This act shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1896.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the amendment may be referred to the Committee on Finance. The VICE-PRESIDENT.

The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, in the absence of objection.
The VICE-PRESIDENT.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PEFFER resumed the floor in continuation of the speech previously begun by him, but, without concluding Mr. VOORHEES said: Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana? Does the Senator from Kansas

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.
Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, this has been a very full day, commencing at 10 o'clock, and everybody has been on a strain.
Id not know that it would profit anything to spend another half hour or hour in session at this time, and, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas, I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m., Thursday, October 19) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, October 20, 1893, at 10 o'clock a. m.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. ISAAC W. CANTER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAYMENTS MADE TO CONTRACTORS ON ACCOUNT OF SPEED OF NAVAL VESSELS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution of the 11th instant, information relating to payments made to contractors for construction of vessels for the Navy on account of speed, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report back resolution No. 3 with a substitute for the same. It is a resolution providing for the time for the consideration of the bill H. R. 139.

The Clerk read as follows: Resolved, That on Monday next, the 23d instant, immediately after the second morning hour, the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 139, a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and the consideration thereof shall be continued after the second morning hour each legislative day thereafter until said bill shall have been fully disposed of; said bill to be considered in the House, or in the Committee of the Whole, as determined by the rules of the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under the rules of the House I

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under the rules of the House I suppose that the bill would have to be considered in the House. This is a very important matter, and I think that the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, that will be determined on Monday when the bill comes up.

The SPEAKER. The question had been suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole; and the Committee on Rules merely added that clause so that the auestion may be determined when added that clause so that the question may be determined when the bill comes up as to how it should be considered. This order does not determine that question.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then that will be determined by

The SPEAKER. It will, under the rules of the House, when the matter comes up for consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Could not that be determined ow, so that we may know how we will vote on the adoption of the order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the order be read again.

The resolution was again read.
Mr. DINGLEY addressed the Chair.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. I did not yield the floor, except for a

question

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will pardon my suggestion that the clause, "to be considered in the House or in Committee of the Whole as the rules may determine," amounts to nothing, because the rules determine that this bill shall be considered in the House. If this is to be considered in the House, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that there will be no opportunity to amend section by section. This is an important bill, on which there is no division on party lines, and we should have opporthere is no division on party lines, and we should have opportunity to go on with each section and amend it as we proceed to consider it. What I was going to suggest to the gentleman is to amend the order so that the bill should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. That would give an opportunity for general debate, then for general consideration, and that puts entirely beyond question the previous question. We could then consider it section by section, and each section could be taken up and amended; otherwise, if it is to be considered in the House, not as in Committee of the Whole, then of ered in the House, not as in Committee of the Whole, then of course only one amendment and an amendment thereto will be in order at any time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This resolution does not determine that

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This resolution does not determine that question at all, but leaves it to be determined on Monday next. Mr. DINGLEY. It does determine it.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Committee on Rules did not deem it necessary or wise at this time to determine that question.
Mr. DINGLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the last clause does determine it; and it must be considered in the House unless otherwise agreed to.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is a difference of opinion as to

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is a difference of opinion as to

Mr. DINGLEY. The rules determine that it shall be considered in the House Mr. OUTHWAITE. This order says that it shall be considered according to the rules of the House Mr. WILLIAM A.STONE. The rules determine that it shall be considered in the House.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is a difference of opinion upon that. The gentleman says it will be determined one way, and other gentlemen say it will be determined the other way.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why not determine that at this

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Why not have the Speaker determine it now

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is nothing in the bill that appropriates any money.

Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman is mistaken. This bill increases the charges on the Treasury, and therefore should be considered in the Committee of the Whole, unless otherwise or-

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Every dollar of expense is paid out of the estate of the bankrupt.

Mr. DOCKERY. It ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg pardon of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Provision is made in this bill to summon jurors co instanti, upon a trial of these cases, to be paid out of the funds of the United States.

of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If it is to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, that is entirely satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill is upon the House Calendar, and the Speaker supposed that the bill carried no charge against the Treasury, and would be considered in the House under the rules, if the House sa determined. It was submitted to the centlement. if the House so determined. It was submitted to the gentleman, and the gentleman from Texas said that it seemed to him that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole, and without undertaking to decide that question, as some point was raised upon it, this order simply provides that it shall be considered as determined under the rules of the House, and left that question to be decided upon an examination of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If, when the question comes up on Monday, the Chair should decide that this bill did not carry any charge upon the Treasury, would it not then, under this order in the House, be considered in the House?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, inasmuch as this is a bill having a great many sections and clauses and dealing with a great many subjects, it seems to me that it can only be considered properly in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] suggests that, as it requires the summoning of jurors to determine certain questions, that may carry it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULBERSON. I referred to that as one reason why it would go to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think that provision might perhaps carry a charge against the Government, as those jurors would be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If that point is well taken, it will carry the bill to the Committee of the Whole, but in any case I think it is highly important that it should be considered in that committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, if there is really any question about this, we ought to determine it now. With reference to the clause in question, because of repeated decisions that unless that clause was there the bill would be considered by the House, notwithstanding the fact that it made an appropriation, I consented to its addition. That has been the repeated decision of notwithstanding the fact that it made an appropriation, I consented to its addition. That has been the repeated decision of successive Speakers. Now, this is a bill of such a character that, if the House intends to go at it at all seriously, it ought to be examined section by section. It would be difficult to do that under the rules of the House, in the House, and it seems to me that some agreement ought to be entered into about it by both sides so I suggest to an expectation of the Committee Marketing and the Marketing and sides, so I suggest to my colleague on the Committee [Mr. OUTHWAITE] whether it would not be well to have that determined now. Is there any objection on the part of any member of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask whether there be objection to providing for the consideration of this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CULBERSON. I must object to that now, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will submit the other suggestion of the gentleman from Maine: Is there objection to considering the bill in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to its being considered in Committee of the Whole, but I do object to its being considered in the House.

sidered in the House.

Mr. REED. I should think the wisest course would be to consider it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then let the rule be modified in that

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Monday next the 23d instant, immediately after the second morning hour, the House shall proceed to the consideration of House bill 139, "A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and the consideration thereof shall be continued after the second morning hour of each legislative day thereafter until such bill shall have been fully disposed of. Said bill to be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] whether it would not be just as con-

one introduction of the control of t to it as possible, and therefore it is to be preferred that the consideration of it shall begin on Monday.

Mr. KILGORE. Is not Monday suspension day?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. KILGORE. It is District of Columbia day.

The SPEAKER. It is District day, but the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia says that he does not decimal the day. sire to occupy the day.

tion on the adoption of the resolution as modified

The previous question was ordered. The resolution was adopted.

WATCH ON STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommenda-tion the bill (H. R. 411) to require steam vessels of the United States of 1,000 tons or more to have one engineer and helper on watch in their engine rooms while under way, and to require all steam vessels of the United States continuously under steam for more than ten hours to carry two licensed engineers; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SECTION 4131, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. MALLORY also, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommenda-tion the bill (H. R. 101) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Stat-utes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation a concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee to reorganize the personnel of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call. The second morning hour begins at nineteen minutes past 12 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees.

GRANT OF LANDS TO ARIZONA. Mr. McRAE (when the Committee on Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3627) granting to Arizona certain lands for use of Territorial prison.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be enacted, etc., That the following tracts of land, fractional sections 12, 13, 14, 15, 22, 23, 24, and 25, township No. 8 south, range 23 west, Gila and Salt River base and meridian, Perritory of Artzona, containing 2,115 acres, lying in the junction of the Gila and Colorado Rivers, be, and is hereby, granted to the Territory of Arizona for the use and benefit of the Territorial prison at Yuma.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, ought not that bill be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule it should be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McRAE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3627) granting to Arizona certain lands for use of Territorial prison, with Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the Chair.

Mr. McRAE. I ask that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report. The report (by Mr. SMITH of Arizona) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. SMITH of Arizona) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3627) granting to Arizona certain lands for the use of Territorial prison, the lands for the use of the careful consideration of the committee and its passage is recommended.

At the function of the Colorato and Glia Rivers in Arizona and lying between said streams are fractional sections 12, 13, 14, and 15, 22, 23, 24, and 25, of unoccupied and unclaimed public lands. This land in its present condition is worthless for any purpose whatever on account of the frequent overflow of said rivers. The land can not be utilized without great expense in construction of levees to prevent the overflow of said streams.

The land lies directly adjoining the Territorial prison grounds in the village of Yuma and can be reclaimed by prison labor and made valuable as a prison farm and thus relieve the people of the Territory of some of the burden of taxation under which they labor. Arizona has never received one acre of land or one dollar of ald from the Government in the construction of any public building. The land granted in the bill is now worthless, and will in all probability forever remain so. It can be made valuable and productive under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, the prepart states all the facts.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, the report states all the facts

Mr. McRAE. Alt. Charman, one report states at the lacts in the possession of the committee in relation to this land.
Mr. SIMPSON. How much land does this cover?
Mr. McRAE. About 2,000 acres, I think. It is a lot of swamp land near the town of Yuma, where the Territorial prison is lo-There are no claimants to the land and no settlers upon it, and the object is to grant it in trust for that purpos

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is the Territorial prison or penitentiary at Yuma? Mr. McRAE. That is my information.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Without knowing much about it it is my understanding that, so far as the temperature is concerned, Yuma is about as near Hades as any place on earth; and I will ask the gentleman whether he thinks this grant of land should be made at that point, looking toward the encouragement of a permanent location of the penitentiary at Yuma? It seems to me, if I was an inhabitant of Arizona, I should want the State prison where it would be more comfortable. It is true people ought to be confined in a State prison if they violate the law, but the confinement there would look to me to be inhuman.

Mr. LOUD. If you go there you must try to keep out of the tite prison. [Laughter.]
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand that, but the matter of reformation, and the doing as little harm as possible, is a theory that obtains, at least, even if it is not always practiced in this country. I have no objection to this grant of land, under the statement of the gentleman, unless it is objectionable from that standpoint.

that standpoint.

Mr. McRAE. Upon that point, Mr. Chairman, I have no information at all. I suppose the prison is located where the people want it. I was never in the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. LOUD. The penitentiary has been there for some years, and is evidently intended to be permanently located there. The climate is as favorable as anywhere in that vicinity.

Mr. McRAE. I thought the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] would be here this morning. I know he feels quite an interest in the bill, and I am now informed that he is sick. The prison is located at Yuma, and this land is wanted by the Territory for that purpose, and can not be used for any other purpose. tory for that purpose, and can not be used for any other purpose without reclamation.

Mr. LOUD. It is some distance outside of the village.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. When the Territory of Arizona comes to be admitted further along, a certain amount of land will be granted for State purposes. Will this grant of land given for the penitentiary now, be deducted from the grant that will then be made?

Mr. McRAE. That could be provided for in the enabling act. As a matter of fact the Territory of Arizona has had no grant of land for any public buildings.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The statement is made that this land is worthless. Why encumber the State with land that is not worth anything?

Mr. McRAE. Our information is that the land is now worthless for settlement, and that it will continue so unless reclaimed. The Territory proposes to reclaim it with prison labor, and use it for a prison farm.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then the statement that it is absolutely worthless is inaccurate, if it can be reclaimed?

Mr. SIMPSON. And even if the prison is removed from Yuma the land will be made valuable for some other purpose by the labor that is put upon it, so that it will be no detriment to the

I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] if there was sufficient evidence presented to the committee that this was swamp land, or land that is valueless for other purposes now?

Mr. McRAE. Yes. We had the statement of the Delegate,

Mr. McRAE. 1 cs. We had the basteries of the property of the land.
Mr. DINGLEY. You have no doubt on that point?
Mr. McRAE. I have no doubt whatever. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is familiar with it, as I understand.
Mr. DINGLEY. Is the bill so drawn that there can not some

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the bill so drawn that there can not some claim be made hereafter to this land, as there has been often to swamp land in other portions of the United States?

Mr. McRAE. The swamp-land grant has never been extended to Arizona. This grant describes the lands by numbers.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that when we have given swamp lands for various purposes, other claimants have come in, and we have had to huy the land several times over.

we have had to buy the land several times over.

Mr. McRAE. This is the first grant of this land for any purpose, and I am informed that it is not in conflict with the claim of any settler.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is this really swamp land? Is it not overflowed land?

Mr. McRAE. I do not understand there would be any distinction between overflowed and swamp lands. They are usually termed swamp lands if overflowed and unfit for cultivation. swamp-land grant does not apply to Arizona, nor to any State admitted since Oregon. There is no trouble on that point. There is no present claimant to the land, so far as we can learn from the records in the General Land Office.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply desire to have the bill so guarded that when we give away land the Government will not be called upon by and by to give something additional from the Treasury, on the ground that it did not give as much as the parties expected.

Mr. McRAE. Oh, Mr. Speaker, there is no danger of anything of that kind. If the Congress of the United States will always be careful not to grant its lands more than once, there will be no trouble of the kind the gentleman refers to. The trouble of which he speaks has grown out of the fact that the Government has undertaken to grant the same lands for two or three different purposes, sometimes to the States for reclama-tion, then to railroads, and in some cases the same lands again to private individuals. That has necessarily created a conflict between the different grantees and claimants and has made trouble. But there is no difficulty of that kind here. This land is described by numbers so that it can be easily located. The grant does not depend on the character of the land.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from the press whether he will not accept an awandment in lines to

Arkansas whether he will not accept an amendment in lines 10

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the bill is not yet open to amendment. The general debate has not yet been

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be closed.

There was no objection.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I ask the gentleman whether he will not accept an amendment to strike out all after the word "Arizona" in lines 10 and 11; that is to say, the words "for the use and benefit of the Territorial prison at Yuma'? This leaves the grant of land absolutely to the Territory of Arizona, and leaves it also to that Territory to use the land for other than prison purposes if it sees proper.

My reason, I will say to the gentleman, for suggesting the amendment is this: that if this land be granted to the Territory of Arizona for prison purposes, possibly later on either the Territory, or after the Territory becomes a State, it may become desirable to remove the State prison from the very unhealthy location where it is now established, and where in my judgment it ought not to be located at all, to some other point.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. In that case the land will revert to the Government.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly; but here is a constant bid by the grant of this land, which may become censiderably improved by prison labor, to keep this establishment in this place Improved by prison lator, to keep this establishment in this place all the time where in my judgmentit may not properly be located. For that reason it seems to me we might very properly make this grantabsolutely, and give the Territory, or the State later on, the power to use the land for any other purpose it sees fit, and not let it stand as a constant bribe, so to speak, to maintain the location of the prison at the point where it is now established. The land, as I understand it, is useless without irrigation, and early the made valuable by considerable lebon to be bestowed. can only be made valuable by considerable labor to be bestowed

Mr. PICKLER. That is a good suggestion.

Mr. McRAE. I have no objection whatever to that. We usually make such grants in trust for specific purposes. The Territory asks for the land for the purpose indicated in the bill. But I have no objection to making the grant absolute and unconditional, and let the Territory use it as they see proper. I want the committee to understand that the amendment will make this a grant without limitation.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois if the amendment he proposes eliminates from the bill the purpose for which the grant is made?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.
Mr. SAYERS. Therefore the Territory of Arizona, if the amendment be adopted, can use the land for any other purpose whatever?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes.
Mr. BRETZ. Certainly. The amendment gives them the land in fee simple.

Mr. SAYERS. Why do you propose to remove the limitation fixed upon the grant in the present bill?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have just stated the reason. Everybody understands that this is the hottest place on earth.
Mr. SAYERS. Where?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yuma, where this prison is located. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I dima, where this prison is located.
Mr. SAYERS. But this grant does not prevent the Territory from changing the location of the prison if they see proper.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am inclined to think if the grant was made as provided in this bill, for the express use and benefit of a Territorial prison, it would be a strong inducement to retain the prison at that point.

Mr. McRAE. I ask for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 10 and 11 the words "for the use and benefit of the Territorial prison at Yuma."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. McRAE. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill as amended favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee reported that the Committee of the Whole having had under consideration remainder that this is a public bill; and the method of corthe bill (H. R. 3627) had directed him to report the same favorably to the House with an amendment.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I ask that the title of the bill be

Mr. CANNON of filmors. I ask that the title of the bill be amended to conform to the action of the House.

Mr. McRAE. That is proper, and I hope will be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that the title read, "A bill granting lands to the Territory of Arizona."

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the title will stand as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the several votes just taken was laid on the tible.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Public Lands any further bills to call up?

Mr. McRAE. We have no other bill to call up at this time.

RAILROAD STATIONS, ETC., IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (when the Committee on Territories was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department. by the Interior Department.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all railroad companies operating railroads through the Territories of the United States over a right of way obtained under any grant or act of Congress giving to said railroad companies the right of way over the public lands of the United States shall be required to establish and maintain passenger stations and freight depots at all town sites established in said Territories on the line of said railroads by authority of the Interior Department.

in said Territories on the line of said railroads by authority of the interior Department.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, require said railroad companies to establish at all town sites provided for in the preceding section, passenger stations, freight depots, and other accommodations necessary for receiving and discharging bassengers and freight at such points, and upon failure of sischarging bassengers and reight at such points, and upon failure of sischarging bassengers and reight at such points, and upon failure of sischarging bassengers and reight at such points, and upon failure of sischarging bassengers and reight at such points, shall be liable to a fine of 850 for each day thereafter until said stations and depots shall be established, which shall be recovered in a suit orought by the United States in the United States courts in any Territory through which said railroads may pass.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The Committee on the Territories have directed me to offer certain amendments, which I send

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to make a point of order against this bill. If I understand the case correctly, it comes from the Committee on Territories. The point I wish to make is that the bill should have been reported by the Committee on Rail-roads, and that therefore it is not properly before the House. Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The bill was reported some two weeks ago by the Committee on Territories, and is on the House

Calendar.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE: But if it had no business there, that fact would not cure the difficulty.

The SPEAKER. What is the difficulty which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] suggests?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The difficulty is that the bill pertains entirely to railroads, and that the Committee on Territories has properly no jurisdiction of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can assure the gentleman that that there can be no possible question as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Territories in legislation of this character. The bill only applies to railroads which are built upon a right of The bill only applies to railroads which are built upon a right of way granted to the railroad by the Government.

It simply requires such railroads to erect depots at town sites which have been located and established according to law.

If the gentleman is friendly to the bill, he should not object to its consideration.

If he is opposed to it, I should hope that so meritorious a measure would not be sent to a committee of which he is a mem-

The bill was referred to the Committee on Territories without objection, and both friend and foe have discussed its merits be-fore that committee admitting and confirming its jurisdiction. If we refer to the Committee on Railroads every bill that speaks of railroads, and if that committee should be as friendly to them as my friend seems to be, we would never have any legislation except such as the railroad people might sanction.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The gentleman's remark is a practical admission that the bill has been referred to the wrong recting the reference of a public bill, as described by the rules, is different from that prescribed in regard to private bills. erroneous reference of a public bill may be corrected any morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, either by unanimous consent, or on motion of a member representing the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred, or on motion of the committee claiming jurisdiction. And where a public bill has been suffered, even erroneously, to be considered by a committee, and that committee has reported it back to the House, there is no way of raising the question of jurisdiction if the bill is a public bill. The case is different in regard to private bills.

But the Chair will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, as the Chair understands, this bill is practically an amendment of a charter granted to a railroad company to pass through lands in the Territories, which original bill was reported by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WILLIAM A.STONE. I submit, then, the parliament ary inquiry whether this bill ought not to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair is informed as to the

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair is informed as to the purport of the bill—and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Wheeler] had shown the bill to the Chair—it is a bill simply requiring railroad companies which have received grants of public lands through the Territories to maintain stations at town sites established by the Interior Department. Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And there is no appropriation. The SPEAKER. The bill makes no appropriation, but sim-ply requires these companies to maintain stations at these points where town sites have been established by the Interior Department. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair therefore thinks the bill may properly be considered in the House. The Clerk will report the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Alabama on behalf of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section I, after the word "at" in line 8, insert the words "or within one-fourth of a mile of the boundary limits of," so as to read "at or within one-fourth of a mile of the boundary limits of all to wn sites established in said Territory on the line of said rallroads by authority of the Interior Department."

Amend the second section by striking out in lines 1, 2, and 3 the words, "the Secretary of the Interior shall within a reasonable time after the passage of this act require said railroad companies to establish at;" and insert "said railroad companies are hereby required within three months from the passage of this act to establish at or within one-fourth of a mile of the boundary limits of."

In the 8th line of the same section strike out the word "the" and insert "said;" and after the word "time," in the same line, strike out "provided for by the order of the Secretary."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as it would stand with these amendments.

The bill as proposed to be amended was read.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Unless some gentleman on the other side desires to discuss the bill, I will move the previous question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think we should have some explanation of the bill before that is done.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN].

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, some days ago when the question of the outrages committed in opening the Cherokee Strip was up for consideration I made a statement that by virtue of certain rules and certain things done by the present Interior Department, the orders of the last Administration had been reversed, and that men claiming to be Indians, in the language of the gentleman from Illinois, were allowed not only to take certain allotments upon which they had made improvements, but were allowed by this Administration to go to the railroads and there take up the lands upon which the railroads had made their stations, their side tracks, and improvements. That is verified by the fact that the Secretary of the Interior now desires the passage of this bill, compelling the railroad companies to build stations and side tracks at the town sites which he has designated, after he authorized the so-called Indians to go in in advance of the white settlers and monopolize and take up the lands which had for years been occupied by the railroad companies with their stations, side tracks, and depots.

The Interior Department has gone farther than that. fuses to allow the people who have located at the railroad sta-tions—and there some of them have towns of two or three thouand people-to even obtain a post-office, although they are 3 or 4 miles from the town sites located by the Government. In other words, the attitude of the Interior Department is this: You people must go to our town sites. We have allowed the Indians to steal the town sites, and we intend, now that you have settled there, to cut you off from having a post-office. We propose to compel you to go to our town sites and patronize them

In reference to the merits of this bill, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this: The people who have located Government town sites are entitled to recognition, and ought to have some facilities to do their business; but I object to this plan, which has been in augurated by the Interior Department, to "hog" the railroad, or rather compel the railroads to build stations at their towns, and department to gettlers now living at the railroad towns of the or rather compel the railroads to build stations at their towns, and deprive the settlers now living at the railroad towns of the benefits of a post-office to transact their business. I can not well object to the passage of this bill, although it is a measure that should be amended in all justice and equity; but I do say that I must repreach the Interior Department for trying to compel one thing in one place, and another at another place. To compel the railroads to build stations at their town sites is right. But I say, on the other hand, that to work in connection with the Post. Office Department and get them to hold up the establishment of post-offices at the other towns is wrong.

If there is to be town-site fights there, if these people interested in this subject are to be placed in that attitude, the time ested in this subject are to be pinced in the activities, the time is coming, I regret to say, when I believe that this country will have its attention attracted to that question, because this matter does not rest now with the Interior Department; if deaths occur there by virtue of these opposing towns each and every murder, because they will be nothing less, must be laid at the doors of the Interior Department.

They have laid the foundation for these troubles out there by authorizing the stealing, for it is nothing more or less, on the part of these so-called Indians, of points that always have been known as railroad stations, where all trains have stopped, and have allowed men to go in there against the protest of the chief of the Cherokee Nation, who wired me yesterday that certain ones allowed allotments did not belong to the Cherokee Nation. They have allowed men to go and take these railroad stations. Now, the Interior Department has located other towns, and it is because of that this legislation is insisted on here. It is an effort on the part of the Interior Department to get out of and cover up the investigation which I have asked for at the hands of Congress

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Oklahoma, I desire to say that the law opening the Cherokee Strip authorized certain allotments, I think seyenty-one in number, to Indians, each allotment containing 80

The evidence before the committee seemed to be pretty clear that certain parties made contracts with the Indians purchasing all or nearly all of these allotments and then arranged with the Indians, I presume before the transactions were made, to have the allotments located as near as possible to the railroad depots. The controversy between the Interior Department and the railroad seems to be practically limited to the town of Enid. At that place the Indian allotments were selected so near the depot as to take up the ground, and it therefore became impossible for the Interior Department to establish a town site at that place. The Secretary of the Interior therefore laid out the town site at what appears to be the most practicable locality for that pur-

The evidence before the committee, I think, clearly establishes the fact that the Indian allotments which were located at Old Enid depot were owned by men who either controlled the rail-road or who had a controlling influence with the railroad offi-

The newspapers inform us that Mr. Dunlap, who, I believe, is a railroad superintendent, announced that the railroad trains would not stop at the town site of Enid, and said if the Post-Office Department established a post-office there they would put up a catch to take the mail and go through at the usual speed, and immediately after making the statement a number of lots were sold at the old town.

It is charged that this order by Superintendent Dunlap was made for the purpose of selling lots, and to give the people to un-derstand that the old town would be favored by the railroad, and that the town site established by the Secretary of the Interior would not have railroad facilities.

The town site of Enid, established by the Interior Depart ment, now has a population of fully 4,000 people, and yet the rail-road company refuses to give them any railroad facilities. It refuses to take on passengers or to stop and put them off. It refuses to either receive or deliver freight, and our infor-mation is that the trains pass through the town at the usual

The Government having established these town sites and peo-ple having located and become citizens of these towns, it would be an act of the grossest injustice on the part of the Government to allow a railroad, the right of way of which was granted by act of Congress, to refuse to establish depots at such town sites and give the people facilities similar to those which are exacted from railroads by the State laws of many of our States. When Congress granted the right of way in this case the law provided that—

Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

We only propose by this bill to require of this railroad the same consideration for the people of the Territory which would be required from them by State laws if the railroad was located

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Is it not a fact that the railroad company has had stations, depots, and sidetracks for two or three years built at the very places where this change is pro-

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is true that they have; but Mr. When he have; but the charge is that they have; but the charge is that the railroad people, or people in close connection with the railroad, bought up the Indian allotments and had them located close up to these depots, so that it was not possible for the Secretary of the Interior to comply with the law and establish a town site at these points. He was therefore ompelled to select some other locality.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under this bill, if there should be established in the Indian Territory, or in any other Territory, a site for a town the railroad company could be compelled to erect a station there whether there were any people in the

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Neither the Interior Department nor anyone else can establish town sites now; they are already established. They were established pursuant to a law of the last Congress, which opened the Cherokee Strip. Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But under this bill it is not neces-

Mr. WHELLERM A.STONE. But there has bit it is not necessary to have anybody living in a town in order to have a depot established there by the railroad company.

Mr. WHELLER of Alabama. But every town at the town sites established by the Secretary of the Interior does in fact have a good number of inhabitants, and the one at which the railroad refuses to establish a depot has 4,000 people.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I know; but the mere fact of establishing a town site would require the railroad, under this bill, to build a station there.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. This bill does not require any thing in the future. It simply requires depots to be built at town sites already established, and as I stated, there is no law which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to establish any other town sites

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It does not say so.
Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, it does; it says "town sites established." It does not say "to be established."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It says "all town sites established

Mr. WILLIAM A.STONE. Itsays an town.

Mr. WILLIAM A.STONE. But it does not say "town sites to be established," and there is no authority by which they can be established in the future. If a law should be enacted directing other public lands to be opened for entry and authorizing the location of town sites, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], would not insist that railroads holding their right of way by a gift from the Government should be authorized to refuse to establish a depot and refuse to stop their trains at town sites located and established by the Government.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But the provision is not consistently and refuse to stop their trains at town sites located and established.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But the provision is not confined to town sites already established.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It says so. It says "town sites

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But that language might include town sites hereafter established.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabams. Well, to earry out your view, it would read "town sites now established."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is necessary, because if the Interior Department should hereafter establish a town site, the railroad company would be required, if this bill were a law, to locate stations there whether there were any people or not.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will the gentleman tell me of any authority by which the Interior Department can now establish a town site?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Has the committee any information as to whether the grades are such that depots and side tracks could be built where this bill requires?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The committee investigated that with great care, and they found there was no serious difficulty about the grades or the cuts. The reports that we have show a cut of some 5 feet, which railroad men say would not be, unfavorable for depot purposes. I have in my hand an affidavit on this point, which is as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, se:

I. Morris Bien, being duly sworn, on oath depose and say that I am an employe and an officer of the General Land Office in the city of Washington; that as such officer I was detailed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to proceed to the Cherokee Outlet and there take charge of laying out and platting the town site of Enid, Okla.; that a plat of the said town site of Enid was duly made after the same had been properly surveyed; that I am well acquainted with and know where the route of the Rock Island Railroad passes through said town site of Enid; that at no point in the southern half of said town site does the cut exceed 5 feet and that at the southern boundary it is nearly at grade; that at the northern boundary, and for a distance of about 1.00 feet, the cut is not more than 6 feet, so that the location for a depot and yard is much better at the southern boundary than at the northern, the difference between them being not great so far as expense of construction is concerned.

MORRIS BIEN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 18th day of October, 1803.

[SEAL] WM. H. DE LACY, Notary Public.

I think that the railroad people and also the citizens prefer to have the depot in the southern part of the town. The ground is better and it would place the depot between 3 and 4 miles from the old station.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Is it not a fact that the railroad company complained that they would be unable to do this, or at least that it would cost them thirty or forty thousand dollars to build depots and side tracks at the town which this bill is supposed to be in the interest of?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They did say that it would cost them that much to build depots and switches at that place, and when I asked them why it would cost so much they said it was because, for a town of that size, the business would be so large that they would have to make four tracks; whereupon I said: "If you admit that the business would be so large as to require four tracks, certainly you can not object to establishing one." Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Is it not a fact that the new town is located in a draw?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I think the location is the best that could be selected under the circumstances.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Are you sure about that?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We had the maps before us and the engineers appeared before the committee, and we gave the subject the fullest investigation possible.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Have you any objection to letting this bill go over until to-morrow or next day?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I think it is almost criminal for Congress to stand here and allow 4,000 people to be deprived of the privilege of having their freight delivered and ordinary railroad facilities given to people by railroads.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Then your committee must have been criminal in delaying this matter so long.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is possible we were derelict in our duty, but quite a number of the members of this House informed us that the bill as it stood did the railroads great injustice, and asked the committee to give the railroads a hearing before acting on the bill. I believe my friend from Kansas was one of those who made this request. Any delay that has occurred was caused by the desire on the part of the committee to extend to members of this House and their railroad friends every courtesy possible, and we had a great desire to see that no incourtesy possible, and we had a great desire to see that no injustice was done to the railroads. I will say to the gentleman that I introduced this bill in less than an hour after I received the first intimation of the refusal of the railroad to stop their trains at the town of Edin, and the first day after the introduction of the bill that there was a quorum of the committee in the city of Washington I reported the bill to the House. The gentleman will see that but four days intervened from the introduction of the bill to the date of the report.

I should have asked for its immediate consideration had it not been that we were almost overwhelmed with requests of mem-bers to give a hearing to the railroads. The committee complied with these appeals and gave the railroads every hearing that with these appeals and gave the railroads every hearing that they desired, with the understanding that the committee would propose any amendment which the railroad desired, and it would not do injustice to the people. The committee completed the work less than an hour ago, and we are here now, notwithstanding the opposition from the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, asking the House to consider the bill.

I do not think the Committee on Territories has been guilty of any very serious delay or neglect.

Mr. TURNER. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER. In what way is the Interior Department responsible for the location of these allotments? Are they not made by the law—not by the Interior Department?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; the law enacted by the last Congress required the establishment of these town sites.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman consent to an amendment inserting the word "already" after the word "sites" in the eighth line of the first section.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think that is necessary, and I am not sure that it will be grammatical at that place in

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It will not hurt the bill at all. Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Let me examine the bill so that I may see how the amendment will read.

Mr. BRETZ. That amendment will simply carry out your idea

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (after examining the bill). have no serious objection to the amendment; it would not interfere with the special purpose we now have in view.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let it be understood; then, that the word "already" is to be added after the word "sites" in the eighth line.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not compel the railroad companies to stop their trains at the Government town sites. It provides that the railroad companies over the right of way granted by the United States "shall be required to establish and maintain passenger stations and freight depots at all town sites established in said Territories on the line of said railroads by authority of the Interior Department."

I wish to say I want those people to have railroad facilities; let that be understood; I want the trains to stop. But the point I made was this, that the Interior Department desires Congress to legislate to compel railroads to favor certain town sites, while on the other hand that Department is using all the power at its command to prevent the Post-Office Department from establishing post-offices at railroad town sites. All I ask is a fair deal for both interests, and let the "survival of the fittest" work out the problem.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We gave the parties in interest a very full hearing. We never heard that the Interior Department was interfering with the Post-Office Department

Mr. FLYNN. I wish to say in justice to the committee that I visited the chairman of the committee and he kindly consented to hear from all these people. Then my requests ceased. I feel that I owe it to the committee in justice and fairness to state that I believe they have heard all sides concerned in this matter; and I have no desire to antagonize the action of the committee. My only purpose is to call attention to the unfairness which is being exercised by the Interior Department.

Mr. TAYLOB of Indiana. What has the Interior Department to do with the Post-Office Department?

Mr. WHEVI Ed. of Alabaran Nothing et al.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Nothing at all.
Mr. FLYNN. Will the gentleman from Alabama consent to amend the bill so as to compel the trains to stop—

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House will give me attention I think can explain this matter in a moment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish you would; I would like to understand it

Mr. SPRINGER. Several years ago Congress authorized the creation of a commission consisting of three persons appointed by the President of the United States to treat with the Cherokee Nation for the cession of what is known as the Cherokee Outlet to the United States for settlement by actual settlers. That commission performed its duties and reported to Congress an agreement entered into with the Cherokee Nation by the commission acting on behalf of the United States Congress, when that agreement was submitted, amended it in several particulars. One of the portions of the original cession which was slightly amended by Congress had reference to the rights of about seventy so-called Cherokee Indians—or white men, practically, who claimed to be Cherokee Indians—who had settled upon a portion of the Outlet, without authority of course, because the Supreme Court of the United States has held that as to that Outlet no person had any right under the law to settle upon it or to take ownership of land in it.

But these seventy persons had done so, either by mistake or designedly, and these commissioners having due record to the designedly; and these commissioners, having due regard to the condition of these settlers and desiring to protect them in their rights, provided in the agreement that those seventy Indians might each take 80 acres of land inside the Outlet. It was understood, perhaps, at the time that they were to take the lands which they had improved and settled upon; and the Interior Department required as to heads of families that they should do this. But those lands, it seems, were not quite sufficient to meet the necessities of the case, as the children of these heads of families were also entitled to take 80 acres of land each.

The law officer of the Department held that as to the children, which constituted a part of the seventy individuals to whom I have already referred, they were entitled to take lands whereever they chose in this Cherokee Outlet. They chose what they supposed were the best lands in the Territory, that is, what they considered the most valuable lands, adjoining the depots and stations of the railroad companies, the Santa Fe line, the Rock Island road, and other companies operating in the Territory. These persons who took the lands adjoining the depots and railroad stations expected to get valuable lands for town-site purposes rather than for farming purposes.

The Interior Department, while required by the law and the decisions of the law officers of the Department to allow these members of the family to take lands wherever they pleased in the Territory—I say while they were so required by the decision of the law officer of the Department, allowing them to take the lands wherever they chose—the Department endeavored at the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after what he allot ments to Indians were made before the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after the course the allot ments to Indians were made before the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after the course the allot ments to Indians were made before the course the allot ments to Indians were made before the course the same time to the course the allot ments to Indians were made before the course the course the same time to the course the same time to the course the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after the course the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after the course the course the same time to do justice to the actual settlers who came in after the course th ward, because the allotments to Indians were made before the first day of the opening was fixed. They took these, as I have said, near the proposed town sites, near the stations of the rail. roads; but the Interior Department having been required also by law to establish town sites, where land offices were to be lo-cated, and which were to become eventually the county seats of the different counties when the Territorial organization was completed, removed along the line of the railroad from where the prospective or future town site was established by the Government to another place than that where the depots or railroad stations were established.

Mr. TURNER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion? Is not one of the town sites, at which a depot is sought to be established, at the present time a land office?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is. The land offices that were established in every case were established at the places where the Interior Department fixed the town site, and not where the railroad station was established, and, as I have just said, this was done to defeat the object of the speculators who first made their appearance before the commission and afterwards before Congress to get in this bill the exclusive right, before anybody else was permitted to go into the Territory to make a selection, and the Interior Department, in order to do full justice to the actual settlers, found it necessary to remove the town sites from 1 to 3 miles distinting the rotate where the residence had established the distant from the points where the railroads had established their stations, for the reason I have just stated.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. This, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen, was doing no injustice whatever to anyone. No one was injured except the speculators, because there was no town established around these stations, nothing but the railroad station and depot. It was an easy matter for the railroad company to transfer its depot or station to the new town site, easier than for the town site to be transferred to the railroad station, because it must be remembered that in some cases these towns had grown to be the station of the thorough remulation. Several thousand so from three to five thousand population. Several thousands of persons in many instances have located at these points; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, the railroad companies positively refuse up to this time to offer depot facilities or to take on or put off the mails at these points.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have but two minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended, because this is an important matter.

Mr. BRYAN. This bill provides that the companies shall establish passenger stations, freight depots, and other accommodations necessary for receiving and discharging passengers and freight at such points; and further provides that upon failure of said companies to establish such stations and depots within the time provided for by the order of the Secretary, etc.

Do we understand that to mean that the Secretary has any right to prescribe what kind of station or depot the railroad companies shall provide?

Mr. KRIBBS. That has been stricken out.

Mr. SPRINGER. That, I understand, has been removed from

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Everything about the Secretary of the Interior has been eliminated from the bill.

Mr: SPRINGER. Now, if the members will turn to page 1919 of the RECORD of this session they will find the decision by Attorney-General Hall, of the Land Office, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, which laid down the law for his guidance and on which he acted in allowing the Indians, members of these families, to locate their lands wherever they chose in the Territory.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. What is the date of that?

Mr. SPRINGER. May 10, 1893. That was the authority on which the Secretary acted when compelled by the law, not by his own wish, to allow these Indian speculators to take possession of the best lands in the Territory. The only way now to justice to the actual settlers is to do, as the Secretary did, put the town sites elsewhere, and require, as this bill does, these railroad companies to furnish depot facilities at such town sites. It seems strange that we should hesitate a moment to adopt stringent measures to require the railroad companies to furnish necessary facilities at the town sites established by law; but such seems to be the case.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand the roads were authorized and constructed before this bill was brought in here?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And the town sites or the lands ad-

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And the town sites or the lands adjacent to the railway stations, established under the law, were taken by the Indians or their families, and they located on land adjacent to the stations of the railway companies.

Mr. SPRINGER. Stations heretofore existing.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Heretofore existing, and existing at the time that the Outlet was opened. Now, that being done under law, as the gentleman claims, and the location of town sites also being under law, the Secretary of the Interior located town sites from two to three miles from the stations as they were legally located before the Outlet was thrown open, so that were legally located before the Outlet was thrown open, so that you have a station located at the time the Outlet was thrown open, or a number of stations, located at certain points; and then by the new order, town sites are located two or three miles away, so that if this bill passes you compel the railway company in this conflict to locate stations two or three miles from the stations as they were originally legally located.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Three and three-quarters miles.

Mr. PICKLER. Every two or three miles.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. While I do not know anything about these railroads, and do not even know their names, it seems to me that in this conflict the railroad company, with a due regard to its business, must locate its stations and maintain them where the business may demand.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would not you suppose that the business demanded it in a town of 4,000 inhabitants?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I should think so, and I should think any railroad company, for its own interests, would locate a station there

Mr. SPRINGER. Where there is a post-office and a United States land-office, but where the company up to this time has refused to stop its trains or to build a station!

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It looks to me very much as though two sets of speculators are proceeding, both under the law, to profit at the expense of the railway company, without reference to the public service.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The railway companies have bought these allotments and sold out the lots. They have made their money and accomplished all they want in the speculation, and now they stop fighting.

Mr. SPRINGER. What I think is just is, that those persons who took locations under the law and came in upon an equality with all the people who entered there, ought to be first regarded, and that their rights ought to be protected, as against the rights of those who secured special and exclusive privileges.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is to say, the owners of town lots at a certain set of stations that were located before the Outlet was thrown open have different interests from the owners of town lots two or three miles distant. It is perfectly patent that you can not maintain stations every two or three miles; so that this whole thing is to be fought out between the town-lot speculators, without regard to the business of the country, at the expense of the railway company.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is to be fought out with regard to the business of the country and with regard to the actual bons fide settlers of the country. That is what this bill requires, that the business interests of the Territory should be regarded and not the interests of the speculators.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansus [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. I am a member of the Committee on Territories, and have looked into this bill somewhat, and know something about the conditions existing in that part of the Territory, having been over the ground.

It is well known to gentlemen who have investigated this subject that this is a contest between a lot of land-grabbers in the main; that the railroad corporations have gone into the land-grabbing business. There is no doubt of that. I think, how-ever, that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] is mis-taken in saying that the Interior Department is to blame for

The bill allowing allotments to these Indians was so amended in the Senate as to allow the agent of the Indians to locate this land anywhere in the Territory. The bill, as it passed the House, originally provided that these Indians should be limited to their improved lands that they lived upon, and adjoining lands; but the bill was amended in the Senate so as to allow the Indian agent to select land anywhere in the Territory.
Mr. CURTIS of Kansas rose.

Mr. SIMPSON. I have only five minutes and can not yield to the gentleman. I say, therefore, that if the Interior Department has erred at all, it was through its agents in some way letting out the fact, or the news getting out in some way that the Government would locate their town sites or county-seat towns at these original points where the railroads had their stations already established. Now, under the law allowing to the railroads the right of way through the Territory, they are granted at each station, every 10 miles, a piece of land 300 feet wide and 3,000 feet long, where their depots are located.

Now, take the Indian allotments. That takes up nearly all the adjoining lands to the railroad depot grounds. It takes up the balance of the town; and therefore the railroads and the Indian allotments had all of it, and located nearly all the town: so the Government, in defense of the people, were compelled to move the townsites 2 miles south of the railroad stations. Now, the railroads refuse to put depots there, and facilities for the use of the people in their freight, mails, etc., and this bill is to compel the railroads to locate their stations at these Government townsites, county seats, and land offices.

Now, then, there is an average of over 5,000 people in each one of those towns. I have here two very large petitions signed by the citizens of this town of Enid. Nearly all the citizens have signed the petition to have a railroad station located there.

have a map and survey of the town, showing the grade, and showing it is possible to have the depot located on a crown where they will have a grade both ways in starting, and where it may be located at very limited expense to the railroad.

This bill has been so amended that the railroads will not be required to put the depot at any special place, but they shall locate it within one-fourth of a mile of the limits of the townsite, thereby giving them liberty to locate it on either side and to select a good location. This is in the interest of and for the protection of the people on the public lands, including the townsites. It is a bill to circumvent and overreach the land grabbers who have been acting in collusion with the railroad corporations in this case as they have all over the Western courty and tions in this case as they have all over the Western country; and it is a bill that ought to pass without a single objection in this

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].
Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the essential point in the allotment to the Indians as it occurs to me has been overlooked in this debate. It is not true that the Interior Department located any towns at the present railroad stations before the Indian allotments were made. It may be true that the Secretary would have located them there if the Indians had not taken the lands adjacent under their allotment contract. The act and agreement, under which they took the allotment lands, authorized them to take them anywhere in the Strip. The act declares that the allotment shall be made "by" the Indians, not "to" the Indians by the Department.

The word "by" was stricken out in the Senate, and the word "to" inserted. This, with other amendments, was disagreed to by the House and the bill went into conference. The Senate amendment was finally yielded, and the bill passed in the shape that I have stated, and can not be held to mean anything except ability of the state of a deliberate purpose to allow the right of selection by the allot-

So, I think the Department properly construed the act to mean that the Indians should be allowed to take their allotments, which they had contracted for, wherever they wanted them.

After the Indians had selected their lands adjacent to the proposed railroad stations the Department, to prevent a monopoly of the townsites by the railroads and Indians, located the Government towns where they are now located.

There was never any location of townsites by the Secretary at the stations near where the Indians made the selections. The simple question involved in this bill is whether Congress will require the railroads running through the Strip to furnish accommodations for freight and passengers at the towns established regularly and by authority of law. I think the bill should be passed promptly.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.
Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is understood that this bill comes up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. When the morning hour is called again this bill will be in order.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, on examining the report of my remarks upon the Geary bill in the RECORD as published this morning I find that I have inadvertently made a mistake of the personnel of the Supreme Court at the time the Scott law was sustained, and at the time that the recent decision was rendered.

I spoke of the personnel as substantially the same in both instances, not remembering at the moment that the Scott law v sustained some three or four years ago. I have corrected the matter in the RECORD, so that in the subsequent publication it will be correct.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. Bartholdt, for two weeks, on account of important business

To Mr. TYLER, for ten days, on account of important business.

PRINTING BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Dockery in the

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2650) to provide for public printing and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on yesterday there were three amendments proposed to the pending section in relation to the number of Con-GRESSIONAL RECORDS to be furnished—one by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER], one by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], and another by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH]. I have conferred with those gentlemen and I think we have arrived at a satisfactory conclusion. At any rate, recognizing the fact that there is a reasonable and just demand for an increased number of this publication, more particularly during this extra session, I have evolved out of the three propositions an amendment which I send to the desk, and which I ask those gentlemen to accept as a substitute for theirs, in order that we may get along with this bill.

I will state that my amendment embraces the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, making a permanent increase of 8 copies in the number of the RECORDS furnished to members, and provides that those 8 copies shall go to public libraries designated by Members and Delegates. In addition to that, it also increases the number to 14 temporarily, during this extra session. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 76, line 232, as follows:

"Strike out 'twenty-two' and insert 'thirty; of which number 8 copies shall be sent, one each, to such public or school library as shall be designated for this purpose by each Representative and Delegate in Congress. In addition to this number, 14 copies of the RECORD of the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress shall be furnished to each Representative and Delegate."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment, the mendment to the amendment, and the substitute will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before that is acted upon I wish to say that the amendment suggested by myself on yesterday, which provided for increasing the number of Con-GRESSIONAL RECORDS assigned to each member from 22 to 50, ARESSIONAL RECORDS assigned to each member from 22 to 30.

I believed then and believe now was nothing but just and reasonable, and necessary to meet the demands of the people. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains all the proceedings of Congress, and there is a growing desire on the part of the people of this country to keep themselves abreast with the times and to know what their representatives in both branches of Congress are doing and what legislation is being enacted. There is no better medium through which this information can be furnished to the people than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD itself, and I believe the people than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD itself, and I believe it would be eminently proper, and for the interests of the people, if we could have the number increased not to 50, but to 100 for every member of this House.

We are all of us called upon for more copies of the RECORD than we can possibly furnish; but, air, as I have never been inclined to obstruct business in Congress since I have had the honor to be a member, as I have never yet sympathized with those who do captiously obstruct the business of legislation, and as I hope that by taking the action which I am about to take I shall furnish a good example to another branch of Congress, wrestling over a question upon which they seem to be unable to agree, and further, as I am willing now, and always, if I can not get all I want to take part of what I want, I will accept the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I hope it will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment to the amendment and the substitute will be regarded as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman what is the number provided in the proposed amendment mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will state to the gentle-man that it will give each of us 44 copies of the RECORD. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amend.

ment for the information of the Committee.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, I ask the gentleman to let us go ahead. We have only thirty minutes to devote to this bill this morning.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I do not think these RECORDS ought to go to the libraries.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, you need not send

Mr. WILSON of Washington. That is all right. The amendment of Mr. RICHARDSON was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Vice-President and each Senator, 44 copies; and to the Secretary and Sergeant-of-Arms of the Senate, each 25 copies; to each Representative and Delegate. 22 copies, and to Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, each 25 copies; to be supplied daily as originally published or inthe revised and permanent form, bound only in half Russia, or part in each form, as each may elect.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Line 292, strike out "Sergeant-at-Arms" and insert "Doorkeeper, for the use of the House."

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

To the library of each of the eight Executive Departments, and to the Naval To the library of bound copy.

To the Soldiers' Home, and to each of the national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers, one copy of the daily.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend line 321, after the word "observatory," by inserting "Smithsonian Institution and the United States National Museum."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend

Mr. HAINER of Neorassia. Mr. Chairman, I move to amena that paragraph in line 323 by inserting, after the word "soldiers," the words "and to each State Home."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to that. Mr. BRODERICK. I move to amend by inserting in line 323, after "soldiers," the words "Homes established for either Federal or Confederate soldiers."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that that is what tally the same the same depart of the same flows.

substantially the same as the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is; but I will withdraw my amendment in favor of that of the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment of Mr. BRODERICK was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Public Printer is authorized to furnish to subscribers the daily Record at 88 for the long and $4 for the short session, or $1.50 per month, payable in advance. The "usual number" of the Congressional Record shall

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

The daily and permanent RECORD shall bear the same date, which shall be of the actual day's proceedings reported therein. Mr. PICKLER. I would like to know what the "usual num-

I do not understand that technical term. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This provision means that the copies heretofore printed as the "usual number," being 1,734, shall not hereafter be published, because we provide in the terms of this bill for the whole distribution.

The amendment of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee was agreed

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to ascertain what number of copies of the first five volumes of the Rebellion Record is required to complete sets of this series in the possession of libraries or persons supplied with subsequent volumes under existing provisions of law, whether such distribution has been through the War Department or otherwise; and the Public Printer is authorized and directed to furnish, upon the requisition of the Secretary of War, the number of copies of each volume required for this purpose, which shall be used exclusively by the Secretary of War for completing such sets.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph just read, the following:

and the Public Printer is further authorized and directed to furnish a emplete set of the Rebellion Records to each Senator and Member of the present Congress not already by law entitled to receive the same.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make a point of order upon that amendment. I do not think it is in order.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why not? It has been customary, I understand, to give new members of Congress these Recompted rds. That is all the amendment proposes. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesses. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to this Congress voting to itself the people's money at the rate of $220 per member. That is what this resolution means. It will cost $220 per set to publish these Rebellion Records. We propose to publish for our individual use books to the amount of $220 per member, and place them in our personal libraries.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Not at all

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman, by the terms of his amendment, proposes to except members of Congress who are already entitled to receive these documents. But how did such members become entitled to this work? They acquired the right under a provision similar to this, inserted in acquired the right under a provision similar to this, inserted in an appropriation bill of the last Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson] suspend for a moment? The Chair understood thegentleman to submit a point of order. Will he please state it? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is substantially the same point which I made yesterday. I do not think that a temporary provision of this kind ought to be inserted in a bill which proposes to make permanent provisions in regard to the publication of documents. The Chair overruled my point yesterday; and for that reason I have indulged in these remarks without awaiting the ruling of the Chair. ing the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order again to-day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, that the lines relating to this publication, which have just been read as a part of this bill, ought not to be there. This provision was enacted into law in the beginning of the last Congress; it is already on the statute book. It was included as part of the text of the appring bill and by oversight was not struck. of the taxt of the original bill, and by oversight was not struck out when the bill was introduced in this Congress. It ought not to be in the bill because it is already the law.

Mr. TURNER. When the gentleman spoke of an expense of $220 for these volumes, I presume he meant $220 per set.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I mean that each member who votes for this publication will vote himself $220 worth of

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not so understand the matter at all. This provision is only to give these Records to those who are new members. We who have been in previous Congresses have already received our sets. Why not give similar sets to the new members?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. In order that we may know what the amendment is, I ask that it be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that during the last Congress there was inserted in an appropriation bill, without notice to members of Congress, and without their knowledge—there was inserted in the Senate and agreed to in conference as I understand a procision by which agreed to in conference, as I understand, a provision by which each member of the Fifty-second Congress was to receive this publication. It cost the Government of the United States $96,000 to make this present to members of the last Congress. That provision was passed in this House without the knowledge, I venture to say, of fifteen men here. I did not know that it was in the appropriation bill; and our

"Watch dog of the Treasury" failed to notify this House that it was there. That action was taken at the first session of the last Congress. In the second session I undertook to repeal the provision which had been adopted; I offered an amendment to strike it out; but the proposition failed. I repeat that during the long session of the last Congress there was inserted in an appropriation bill, without one word of debate upon it in this House, a provision which made to us a present of these works for our personal libraries.

Sonal libraries.
Mr. BRETZ. I wish to say that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Mr. BRETZ. I wish to say that my colleague, Judge HoL-MICHARDSON] does great injustice to my colleague, Judge HOL-MAN, when he says that my colleague failed to notify the House that we were voting $220 to each member. I distinctly recol-lect, and the RECORD will show the fact, that my colleague bit-from Indiana to turn to that speech, if he can. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] may have objected to the amendment by number, but nobody knew what the number referred to. that a great many members of this House did not know I know that a great many members of this House did not know that they were getting such a present until after Congress had adjourned for that long session. That provision, as I have stated, gave all the members of the Fifty-second Congress one copy of this publication at a cost of $220 for each member, or in the aggregate about $96,000. Now, this proposition comes here to give the new members, who were not members of the Fifty-second Congress, the same number. I do not know how many there are; but if there are a hundred new members here and in the Sente if will amount to a hundred times $220, or $22,000. the Senate it will amount to a hundred times $220, or $22,000.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was recognized.
Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two? Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee,

Mr. Pickler. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, if he has the information, how long it is calculated before the publication of the rebellion records will be completed?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not give the exact date, but when this report was being prepared we called before us the gentleman in charge of that work, and he stated, as I remember, that they could get through about 1895, if I remember convectly. correct

Mr. PICKLER. Then these records will be completed at that time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; the records will be completed, but each session of Congress can keep on having this additional printing done for the new members without limit.

Mr. PICKLER. But while the work is running as a current with the work is running as a current volume the members here are, I think, entitled to receive them, or ought to receive them. Solong as the volumes are being published why not let the members have them? When the work is completed, and the complete sets only could be furnished, that would be a different thing, and there would be no such argument for distributing them among the members as now applies.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But there are already about ninety volumes published, or the work will make that number of volumes; and this proposition would simply be making ourselves a present of that publication.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, well, as far as that is concerned, you can consider it making ourselves a present of every document we get from the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; it is a very different case. Other documents are received for our constituents, but this proposition is a direct present to each member of the House.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, they will go to the public libraries in each member's district in time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If they go to the libraries in the districts there is no use in limiting it to one copy. The gentleman is mistaken in that, however. This proposition is for gentleman is mistaken in that, however. This proposition is for the personal use of the members themselves. Mr. PICKLER. While I am not in favor of an indefinite continuation of this, it does seem to me that as the work is to con-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. About that time.
Mr. PICKLER (continuing). Well, about that time. I say if it is to continue no longer than that, it is not too much to let the

it is to continue no longer than that, it is not too much to let the members of Congress have a set of them.

Mr. WILLIAM. A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, in the first place it may be said that there ought never to have been any records of the war of the rebellion published. On account of economy that may be entirely true. But inasmuch as they have been published, and have been given to members of Congress, it seems to me no more than fair and right to give to the new members the same privilege that we have had. Therefore I have offered the amendment in good faith, believing that it would be simply complimentary to the new members to give them these records.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me I wish to ask him if we continue this donation or distribution with the present Congress to every new member here, who was not a member of the last Congress, then the Fifty-fourth was not a member of the last Congress, then the Fifty-fourth Congress will want to distribute the Records amongst new members of that body, and so on with the Fifty-fifth Congress, and indefinitely to the end of time.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no. Because the publication will be completed after awhile.

Mr. SIMPSON. And where is a stop to be put to this kind of averagidities?

lect, and the Record will show the fact, that my colleague bitterly opposed that proposition, stating on the floor of the House that that was just what we were doing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like my friend

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, it becomes me, at all events, for I voted against that proposition.

Mr. PICKLER. Will you take the books if they are given to you?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will take the books, because if I do not it twill not save the Government any expense. They will be printed anyway. But it is useless to found any argument on that. We can not put a stop to the extravagant expenditures of the people's money here too soon.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But this does not benefit us. It isfor the people. Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. SIMPSON. Perhaps not the individual Congressman, but some special friend is favored. At all events the people have to pay the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It seems to me that the gentleman ought not to begin on the new members of this Congress.

Mr. SIMPSON. We must begin somewhere. The members of the Fifty-fourth Cougress will be told they ought not to begin on the new members of that Congress.

Mr. HICKS. Well, do not begin on this book anyway.

Mr. SIMPSON (continuing). And the Fifty-fifth Congress will be told that they ought not to begin on the new members of that body, and so on. Now, I am opposed to this kind of expenditure of the money of the people.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let us begin by cutting off some other publications then, and not cut this one off.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to make an appeal to my friend who offered this amendment [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE]. The printing of this document was authorized by a provision in an appropriation bill. It does not properly belong to this bill. I ask my friend to withdraw this amendment, and to offer it when we consider the appropriation bill. If it is to be done at all let it be done in the same way that it was hereto-fore ordered, and do not make this committee order it. Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should be very glad to oblige my friend, but I can not do that.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the learned chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] is somewhat at fault in relation to the facts as to how this book was printed in the Fifty-second Congress. I listened to that discussion with great care, because I was here when the original printing of this book was authorized, and while I was already in receipt of a copy, and had not a particle of personal interest in the matter, I voted for it because I believed it to be right.

particle of personal interest in the matter, I voted for it because I believed it to be right.

The additional copy which I received went to one of the Grand Army posts in my district, and I want to say there is no reason why every Grand Army post in the United States that wants a copy of this Rebellion Record should not now have it.

The appeal which the learned chairman [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] now makes to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] to wait until we reach our regular appropriation bill, is the ordinary soft solder given to gentlemen who make such propositions. That will not come until the judgment day, perhaps, if then; and if we have to wait until it comes from the gentleman's committee as an original proposition with regard to the public printing, we will also have to wait perhaps beyond that, as we have to wait for everything else except that which suits the particular notion of this learned gentleman.

Therefore, having voted in the last Congress to give the new members of the Fifty-second Congress each a copy of this book—those of us who were here before having received it previously—I do not see any reason why we should not now give those who come in as new members of the Fifty-third Congress, each a copy of this book, in order that a large number of posts and the public libraries in the United States which have not the book may be supplied. This is one of the most valuable publications the Govarnent have var made. A century from now it will be prace.

be supplied. This is one of the most valuable publications the Government has ever made. A century from now it will be practically invaluable and can not be purchased. It can not be reprinted on account of its size. We have now the facilities to furnish the public libraries in the United States with copies, by giving each new member an additional copy. That will make perhaps an hundred additional copies, which will go far toward supplying the deficit. For this reason I believe the amendment of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM. A. STONE] should be adopted.

I have not a particle of personal interest in the matter, any more than I had in the vote which I gave in the last Congress, because I was already in receipt of my quota for distribution, and had received a copy for myself, which came under the original

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it comes with exceedingly poor grace from those old members of this House, who have heretofore been supplied with this work, to object to the new members receiving it. There is great demand for it all over the entire country. I have received numerous for it all over the entire country. I have received numerous letters during the short time I have been here, making requests for copies of this work. Now, it seems to me very unjust, and very much after the fashion of the dog in the manger, that those gentlemen who have been supplied should say that the new members shall not receive copies of this Rebellion Record. I do not believe there is any justice or right in it, and I do not believe the country will sanction or back up a sentiment so thoroughly impregnated and weighted down with selfishness as that kind of a sentiment necessarily is.

The people of this country are entirely willing to approve the action of Congress whenever it is directed toward the dissemination of information, and this is a work that is valuable, and is desired by the people of this country.

Mr. SIMPSON. This copy is not for distribution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that; but I suppose a member receiving a copy of this work would have a right to turn it over to a library, where it would be accessible to hundreds of

I have in my own State a great number of Grand Army posts, and I have received from these Grand Army posts requests for this work.

Now, gentlemen, the Congress of this country can afford to be dr and just to the people of this country.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Mr. DOOLITTLE. I w

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Do you not know that when this publication was made, in the Forty-seventh Congress, that 26 copies were ordered to be sent to every Congressional district, to designated libraries, and persons named by members of that Congress; so that 26 copies of this work must be going into your neighborhood?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, we had no member of Congress at that time, with the exception of one Delegate, and there are a good many States now that were Territories at that time. At all events, this country will not suffer from a little expenditure of this kind; and I am tired of this grum, pious sort of economy, especially when it comes to disseminating informa-of economy, especially when it comes to disseminating informa-tion to the people of this country, and it is not fair, gentlemen, to the members who are unsupplied. [Cries of "Vote!"] Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am a new member of Congress, and therefore it does not come with bad grace for me to oppose this appropriation. I am very anxious to have these records. There are in the Rebellion War Records some things about those who are near and dear to me which would be of great value to me. I propose sometime to have that book, but I have not heretofore been rich enough to buy any set put within my reach. There are a great many things, Mr. Chairman, that I want which I conceive I have no right to vote my-self out of the Treasury of the United States; and because the Fifty-second Congress took this action in this matter it is no arranged why we should commit the same away. gument why we should commit the same error.

If the Fifty-second Congress voted a book to each of its members, not for purposes of distribution, not for purposes of disseminating useful information, as the last gentleman has said, but for the purpose of putting it upon the private library shelf of each member, then that Congress made a criminal legislative error; and I do not see it is any reason why we should fall into their footsteps and put ourselves in the same attitude. I raise no false cry of economy. Whenever it comes to a public purpose, I am in favor of the Government of the United States putting its hands into its pocket and pulling out the very last dollar nec its hands into its pocket and pulling out the very last dollar necessary to subserve public purpose; but I am not in favor, here and now, of the body of economy, the body of the people, as we boast we are, putting ourselves upon record as expending money, not for public purposes, but for private purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat has made my speech, but I desire to emphasize it. I wish members to understand that this proposition is not to furnish libraries with this work, or to furnish Grand Army posts with the work, and not to put it into the hands of the people, but to put it in the hands of members of Congress; "to each Senator and member of the present Congress not already entitled to receive the same" is the language of the amendment. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we can not go so far as that in this bill. We will load it down so that it will become absolutely necessary to defeat the entire measure if we become absolutely necessary to defeat the entire measure if we put provisions of this kind upon it. This must stop some time. We will always have some new members here, and the argument made in their behalf would make the publication perpetual.

We must go slow now in the matter of appropriations. We hear from the Treasury Department that there will be a deficiency of $50,000,000 during this fiscal year, and that the receipts of the Government are not equal to the expenditures from day to day. We can not afford to follow the precedents of the Fifty. to day. We can not afford to follow the precedents of the Fifty-first Congress, in the matter of second Congress, nor of the Fifty-first Congress, in the matter of make precedents now. expenditures; but we must begin to make precedents now.

have favored some slight increases here and there during the consideration of this measure, but in every instance with the view of serving the people and supplying them with such information as can be gathered from public documents, through the media of public libraries. In every instance I have opposed such increases as were intended to put additional matter at the personal disposal of the members. Mr. Chairman, this is a good fill a reform bill, a bill to save money and to better serve the bill, a reform bill, a bill to save money and to better serve the people. I hope we will not destroy it by putting this selfish, extravagant, and unnecessary amendment upon it.

Mr. McKAIG. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to one fact. This bill is the result of the sitting of the special joint committee of both Houses authorized under concurrent resolution of February 9, 1891, not only to systematize the printing of this Government, but also to cut down the expenditures. Now, as members of the House, we continually hear upon this floor criticism of the Committee on Printing on account of the extravagance of measures that are reported from it. When this testimony was taken, for the purpose of producing a bill of such a character as to cut down the expenditures for the printing of the Government there were frequent examinations of experts upon this question, in this city during the three or four months the committee was in session, between the end of the Fifty-first Congress and the commencement of the Fifty-second.

Now, the intention of this bill is to cut down the expense of printing, but if you look into it, you will find that you are gradually loading up the bill to such an extent that it will be necessary, as has been stated here, to defeat it in order to avoid going beyond what has been done heretofore in the way of expenditure for printing. Our public printing now costs us $3,600,000. Of that large amount only $300,000 is expended under the authority of the printing committee of this body. The rest is done under permanent laws which have been put upon the statute books, enabling the Departments to have this work done. You have added $45,000 to this bill already for an extraneous matter, a republication of the book on Diseases of the Horse.

Now, you propose to put in a publication that will cost, according to the number of new members you have, not less than $25,000 or $30,000, or perhaps $50,000. So you see that the very objectaimed at by this investigation, the adoption of a better method of systematizing the work and the cutting down of expenses is likely to be entirely defeated. Now, I appeal to members of the House, if it was necessary two or three years ago to author-ize a committee to sit between Congresses in order to mark out forms by which the cost of public printing could be reduced--if that forms by which the cost of public printing could be reduced—if that was necessary at that time when the Treasury was full, how much more necessary is it now with your Treasury virtually empty!

Are we to go before the country with the record of having brought in a bill for the purpose of reducing the cost of printing, yet having passed that bill in such form as to carry the cost beyond what it was three or four years ago? Do gentlemen, by loading down the bill in this way, want to make it necessary for us to kill it? This amendment relates to a new matter, a matter that does not belong to this bill at all. If you want this proposition considered, why not introduce a resolution and let it come before the House on its merits, instead of thrusting it into this bill and making it the instrument for consigning the bill to its bill and making it the instrument for consigning the bill to its

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 2650) to provide for public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MUTCHLER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts). The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, October 19, 1893, at 2 o'clock p. m., be fixed as the time for paying appropriate honor to the memory of Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions that I send to the desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and tender to his family assurances of sympathy in

State of remnsyration that the state of the House be suspended that opportunity Resolved. That the business of the House be suspended that opportunity and the memory of our deceased colleague and Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended that opportunity may be given for fitting tribute to the memory of our deceased colleague and to his eminent public and private virtues, and great public services.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the Senate, and, as a further mark of respect, that upon the conclusion of these ceremonies the House shall adjourn.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, William Mutchler, a Representative in Congress from the Eighth district of Pennsylvania during several terms, departed this life at his residence in the borough of Easton, Pa., on the 23d day of June last at fifteen minutes before 3 o'clock a.m. Soon after our assembling here in August I made formal announcement of the fact to the House, stating that at some future date his colleagues would ask the House to lay aside its public duties and set apart a day, that fitting tribute might be paid to the memory of our lamented brother. In asking the House at this time to suspend its usual deliberations for this purpose, we but observe a very praiseworthy custom that has obtained in both Houses of Congress from the formation of our Government. Nor do we ask it as a mere formal ceremony, but to testify our appreciation of a faithful member of this body and our admiration for an esteemed colleague. To me it is a painful duty, characterized by grief for a long cherished friend. Of all the tributes of the human heart, of all the sentiments and feelings incident to human nature, there is, Mr. Speaker, perhaps none so ennobling in their character, so re-fining in their influence, and so elevating in their tendencies, as that feeling of reverence for the loved one dead. Who can depict the anguish of the heart-stricken widow left to mourn the loss of her devoted companion through life, or the heavy-laden sorrow of the affectionate child for the devoted father. We are so constituted that, in the attachments men form for each other in their associations through life, the separation by death awakens the noblest impulse of our heart and arouses the keenest pang of sorrow.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that such sentiments as these prompt the members of this House to participate in and witness these memorial exercises to our departed colleague, for I may say no higher evidence of the esteem in which he was held can be found than the many sincere expressions of regret made by members over his death; and the fact that the most prominent members of this House, and those who were most intimately acquainted with Mr. Mutchler, made known their desire to testify their admiration and respect for the man by taking part in these cere-

William Mutchler was born December 21, 1831, at Chain Dam, Northampton County, Pa. He was the son of John and Margaret Mutchler, and one of seven sons. His father was a descendant of that sturdy German stock who imbued with love of our free institutions left their native land, took up their abode our free institutions left their native land, took up their abode in our young Republic, and contributed so much to its development and marvelous growth. Mr. Mutchler's father settled many years ago moving from the State of New Jersey, in Northampton County, Pa., engaging in the business of a farmer. He died when the subject of our sketch was only 7 years of age, and young Mutchler was thus early in life compelled to assist in supporting the family. He did not have any of the usual advantages of life in the way of enjoying facilities for education, but in his younger years he manifested those sturdy traits of character, of self-reliance, industry, and perseverance, which so strongly characterized his career as a man. Later, profiting by the industry of himself and his brothers, William was enabled to acquire facilities for a better education, and for several years, though at considerable inconvenience, he was enabled to attend the famous academy of Dr. Vandever in Easton, and later in life began the study of law in the office of his brother, H. M. Mutchler, eq. Although not favored with the means or facilities of obtaining an extensive education during his minority, yet Mr. Mutchler became and was quite an accomplished scholar. He was a close student, a great reader, and was thoroughly well informed upon all branches of literature. He was familiar with all the works of the great authors, with history, poetry, arts and sciences, as well as the Scriptures. He was particularly well versed in the sacred writings, and it afforded him great pleasure to discuss and discourse upon the Books of the Testament, both old and new, their origin and Whist reading law he was made deputy sheriff of his county, and served in that capacity for several years; and was married to Miss Louisa Cope, daughter of —— Cope, then sheriff of said county, to whom was born six children, all of whom are dead ave one—Howard—who is the worthy successor of his father in this body. In 1860 Mr. Mutchler was elected by the people of his county to the office of prothonotary, and reslected to the same office, serving from 1860 to 1866, and it was in these positions that he acquired that practical education which so well equipped him, and which he found of so much value afterwards in the practice of his profession. He also held the office of assistant assessor of internal revenue from 1867 to 1869, and was chairman of the Democratic State committee of Pennsylvania for the years 1869 and 1870, in which position he displayed ex-traordinary executive ability and qualities of leadership.

Mr. Mutchler was, as we all know, a man of splendid physique and appearance, one that would attract attention in any assembly, and clearly indicated the strength of character, the generosity of heart, and power of intellect that characterized him. It was apparent at once that he was a man destined to be and to become prominent among his fellow-men. He enjoyed the unbounded confidence and respect of his people, as was demonstrated by his repeated elections by handsome majorities, and the fact that in his own county he never had opposition for a nomination. and this was the secret of his long-continued power with his fellow-citizens.

As a lawyer he brought to the practice of his profession a zeal and fidelity that made his clients' cause his ewn. Honorable and honest in all his dealings with court and client, he enjoyed the respect of all, and the elequent and sincere tribute of the bench and bar of his county at the time of his death is the highbench and bar of his county at the time of his death is the highest testimonial of his standing with them. He was of sound judgment, studious and painstaking to seek the right, and untiring in his efforts to sustain it. He was first elected to this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, in which he served with distinction and ability. He was also a member of the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses, and his associates here can and will cheerfully testify, that his service all of these years was characterized with a degree of fidelity, ability, and patriotism that distinguished him as a devoted Representative of his people and his country. He served as a member of various important commitcountry. He served as a member of various important commit-tees of the House, and in the last Congress rendered invaluable service as a member of the important Committee on Appropria-

Mr. Mutchler was a man of kindly disposition, social and gen erous in all his relations. He was a most devoted husband and affectionate father, who idolized his family, and who worshiped at the hearthstone as an altar. As a friend he was sincere, unflinching, and unswerving in that loyalty that he made his own standard of friendship, and as a man he was broad and charitable enough to make all mankind like him. He was a great lover of nature in all its phases, and found much pleasure in communing with it in all its forms. He seemed desirous of delving into and unraveling all the great mysteries of nature which surround us, and its study was a source of interest and pleasure to him. He was of that disposition that could "find tongues in trees, books in was of that disposition that could "and tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything." A subject of especial interest to him, and one upon which he loved to dilate, was the science of astronomy, with which he was quite familiar. To read the stars, to watch the course of the planets, to admire all the grandeur and beauties and wonders of the heavens, was always a matter of enjoyment, and nothing afteriled him were convenient and some convenient and solver picks. forded him more genuine pleasure than on a clear night when the heavens were brilliantly studded to visit the Observatory, and, with the nid of a powerful telescope, look in admiring won-der on the grand panorama there presented. The heavens seemed to have an especial attraction for his mind, and the sun, that "great orb of day," the fountain of all light and life, challenged his unbounded admiration, and often he expressed the wish: "When I die bury me with the setting of the sun." This wish of their lamented dead was gratified by his family and friends, and as the last remains of William Mutchler were lowered into and as the last remains of William Mutchler were lowered into the cold and silent grave in the beautiful cemetery near his home the setting sun was sinking below the western horizon.

Mr. Mutchler had been ailing for some time prior to his demise, but until very shortly prior to his death it was not thought that his condition was at all serious or alarming. I know that he was complaining and had been unwell during the last session of this House, and I am strongly inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that his indefatigable labors, his carnest application to the last parious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Arman and the serious duties are serious duties. borious duties which devolved upon him as a member of the Appropriations Committee, tended to exhaust his vitality and went upon his system. We parted after the adjournment, when in in company with his wife he made a visit to Florida with a view of recuperating his wasting energies and regaining his wonted health. He returned from the trip apparently considerably benefited by it.

I met him here in Washington shortly after his return, when he appeared to be enjoying tolerably fair health, but his malady had done its work and its ravage on his system was telling. In the month of June last, in company with several friends, he went on a fishing expedition up into the mourtains of Pennsylvania, but immediately on their arrival there he was selved with an attack of illness that was alarming in its character. He was taken back home, and for a few days seemed to be recovering, but the inexorable decree had gone forth and he was compelled to bow to that inevitable decree, "That it is appointed for all men once to die," and in his home, to him so dear, attended by his devoted wife, without any apparent struggle or pain, our lamented colleague, as I have stated, passed away as if in sleep.

Mr. Speaker, I bring this garland and place it on the tomb of my departed friend, and pay this humble tribute to his memory. We entered upon our careers as members of this House at the same time, and stood side by side in front of your desk when for the first time the eath of office was administered to us. We were acquainted prior to that, but from that time an intimacy and friendship grew up between us that, I am glad to say, continued up to his death. During our service together here we were close companions, enjoying each other's confidence, and I am proud to say, each other's friendship. If at any time our course on public matters were not in harmony it was only because of a difference of conviction as to our respective duty and in no way estranged our pleasant personal relations.

When I visited Easton to attend his funeral and viewed his remains I felt from the habit of long association as if I must get some recognition from him, and instinctively, as I stood by his bier, I reached out my hand as for the usual greeting bet us, but only to be reminded by his cold and irresponsive hands that he was silent in death, and I must be compelled in parting to bid him only a silent farewell. As in life I esteemed my friend, so in death shall I cherish his memory.

Mr. Speaker, generations of men come and go and follow each other as do the billows on the ceean's crest rising in their majestic form, crystal crowned, only to fall and be dashed to pieces on the shore and disappear; but it can not be, Mr. Speaker, that all there is of this mystery of life is the narrow span between the cradle and the grave. Must we be forced to the belief that all these great endowments given to men such as our lamented friend was gifted with, bright intellect, exalted virtue, nobility character, and all that we admire in mankind die with the body and are buried in the grave.

It is not given to us, Mr. Speaker, to know all these great mysteries, but though it may be above it is not against reason to indulge in the confident hope and entertain the firm conviction that beyond the grave there is a brighter and happier world where the beloved ones on earth shall meet again. The great mystery beyond is revealed to our friend. Let us hope that he is at rest

Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.

In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, William Mutchler was my friend, and I deplore his death as a personal bereavement

He was a Pennsylvanian, and the great State we both loved mourns the loss of a filial and devoted son. He was an American, and from the ranks of the Nation's law-makers has gone a loyal, brave, and true public servant.

Bounteous tributes of reverence and affection have already been offered to his memory by his brethren of the bar and sorrowing neighbors and constituents. To these it is befitting that his associates in this House add their testimony to his high qualities as a Representative, and the expression of their sorrow at the loss of a trusted, honored, and loved associate.

My acquaintance with Mr. Mutchler commenced before we met as members of this House, but it was not intimate, and came only through the courteous intercourse of casual meetings. We differed politically, and were far separated geographically, but during our common service in this House we drew gradually nearer together until, during the last session, we often ate at the same table and enjoyed many of the confidences of intimate friendship. In many respects we stood on common ground. Our early lives showed many instances of parallel experience, and each day's intercourse enlarged our sympathy and strengthened our mutual regard; and the news of his death brought to me all the shock and grief of a personal loss.

Mr. Mutchler was a man of attractive and winning qualities, and attrached his friends to him as with bands of iron. He was always true to them with a loyalty that knew no thought of desertion or betrayal, and they trusted him without question, without hesitation, and without doubt. His rugged honesty, his entire candor, his fidelity to every trust and to every friend were the solid underlying traits of anoble character. He was modest, unostentatious, sincere, generous hearted, broad minded and level headed. He disliked display, never posed, and did nothing simply for effect; in short, to use the expressive words of another, he was "a perfectly natural man." He was simple in his habits, plain in his tastes, quiet in demeanor, straightforward in action. He was manly, independent, self-respecting. He asserted and guarded his rights with gentle modesty, but with manly dignity. He bowed to no dictation, he acknowledged no master. He owned himself.

As a lawyer he attained greater success than most men who come to the bar as late in life as he did. He was not accomplished in the learning of the schools. His early education was but the average academic training of his day. His preparation for the bar came largely through the practical experience of the prothonotary's and sheriff's offices, and only later did he graph with the science and philosophy of the law. His logical mind, clear insight, direct methods, and untiring industry speedily gave him efficiency, and he became a strong and successful lawyer, enjoying the fullest confidence and respect of both bench and bar.

As a member of this House he commanded the confidence and respect of all, and the closer attachment and affection of those who knew him intimately. He could not be called eloquent, but was clear, logical, direct, and candid in statement, and his perfect fairness, large views, and broad statesmanship gave significance and force to his utterances, and always commanded respectful attention. He was a solid rather than a brilliant man. What he accomplished was by no sudden flight, no meteoric flash of genius, but by quiet, faithful, persistent labor.

I can not better delineate his Congressional career than to quote his own words, uttered in this House in the chaste and feeling tribute paid by him to the memory of the late Samuel J. Randall. Said he:

The one great end and aim of his Congressional life was to do his duty

"He walked attended By a strong-aiding champion, conscience"— bringing to the labors of every day the strong common sense and vigorous interest of an earnest, faithful, honest man."

Every word of this is true of William Mutchler. In uttering them he but gazed into the mirror and pictured his own character. Strong common sense, carnestness, fidelity, and sincerity, were his distinguishing characteristics. He was always true to his word, to his friends, to himself.

He was a zealous partisan, strong in his allegiance to the party to which he belonged, but stronger in his loyalty, to the commands of his own conscience, and when in the Fifty-first Congress his party with almost unbroken front rallied to the standard of the free coinage of silver, he had the courage to separate from them on that question. On that subject he had positive and well-defined convictions, the result of careful thought and study, and he stood resolutely to them. His love of his party was strong, but for his country stronger.

He was a true representative of his people. He knew them, loved them, sympathized with them, and was their counselor and confidant as well as leader. His early life on the farm, and later services as prothonotary and sheriff of his county and collector of internal revenue of his district brought him into daily, close, and intimate contact and sympathetic association with them, and he came to understand their views, sentiments, motives, and characters with more than ordinary thoroughness and gained a place in their affections and confidence from which no assaults of political rivalry could dislodge him.

But, sir, his work is done; his career is ended. His place in this House is filled and worthily filled by another, and the name of Mutchler still remains on our rolls; but the void in the hearts of loving friends and trusting constituents has not been filled. They will long cherish the memory and mourn the loss of a friend always loyal and true, of a Representative always faithful, diligent, and efficient.

[Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to east my votive tribute of honor upon the narrow resting place of my late colleague from Pennsylvania, the Hon. William Mutchler. I need not say to you who knew him so well, respected him so much, and loved him so dearly, what a melancholy pleasure it is to me, since we can no more recall him to life, in approaching the duty of adding a few words to the memory of the good and great associate and colleague gone. I can only regret my inability to find expression adequate to his sterling worth as a man, his conspicuous integrity and ability as a statesman, his pure and lofty patriotism which always lifted country above

To his marked physical conditions as well as strong mental force he owed his steady and withal rapid rise in life. Inured to toil from boyhood he learned self-denial in the hard but effective school of necessity. From the habit of labor he acquired the nobility of self-reliance. Rising from the ranks by his own exertions, he early became possessed of a spirit of equality taught by intimate association with humanity in all its phases and multiform relations. As he rose from humbler to higher grades of labor and responsibility he never lost nor yet abated his sympathy with his first surroundings and early struggles for the obligations above which he so steadily, so splendidly rose. His large heart was in as close, intelligent, sympathetic touch with the humblest and most unlottered as it was with the most influential and wisest of his constituents. His people knew his great and noble creed; they trusted him and he never faltered, never grew weary in his work for them. He was a man without prejudice, a friend without hypocrisy, a politician without malice, a statesman without guile, a philanthrophist without pretense, a Christian without cant. He was bigger than any party platform, broader than any church creed.

A strict partisan, when the behest of a great body of his party meant not the good of country, his rugged integrity shook of all allegiance at the call of patriotism. He could neither be cajoled, bribed, nor intimidated. His statesmanship was as wide as his constituency and State; his patriotism was as broad as his country; his philanthropy embraced the universal world of humanity everywhere, regardless of creed, color, or conditions, and held it in intimate, sympathetic touch. He was safe in counsel, prompt in action, as gentle as he was brave. He was true to self, loyal to friends, faithful to obligations. Naturally proud of popularity which he deserved, he shrank from even a saedow of hypocrisy. His chief aim was to do right whether he seemed right or not. So his constituents came to know and hence their unswerving trust in him. So his fellow-members on this floor came to know and hence their admiration, confidence, and long for him.

Good in all things, great in many, he owed his success most largely to his unusual talent of labor. He had learned how to labor and to wait in the school of necessity, and the habit thus formed became his solid stepping stone to fortune and fame. Nature, which had lavishly endowed him with talent, bestowed upon him none of the glitterand glow of genius. He toiled and climbed, never soared to the object of his ambition. His ascent was rapid and steady, not brilliant and fitful; among the stars of his country's constellation his fame will burn on forever with the steady flame of the fixed star rather than glimmer, flash, glow, and disappear like the erratic comet.

His forceful, yet gentle, life is an object lesson for the American youth of to-day, to-morrow, and for all time. Showing, as it does, that to him who wills and fortifies that will with labor and perseverance there is nothing impossible, the career of Hon. William Mutchler is at once an incentive to honorable ambition and a chart to show the road to wealth, renown, and all the world holds dear in pursuit and achievement.

But he has gone from among us. His chair is vacant. Fully as his honored and distinguished son, his successor, may fill his place to his constituents, there is an aching void in the hearts of his late associates which no successor, not even a son, can fill. These walls may echo back words as wise, sentiments as lofty, patriotism as pure, but the echoes of his voice will often be heard above them, and in the sacred hours of retrospection which come to all of us and come in welcome in the silent watches of the night, in the idle daydreams of midsummer, the echoes of his manly voice will ring again through the vaults of memory and incite us, I trust, to higher thoughts, loftier purposes; deeds of nobler daring, of purer self-abnegation.

A few years ago, in the prime of his splendid manhood, in the perfection of his rare physical and mental endowments, he was the last one whom Death would have seemed to mark for his early passing away. But his life work was not to be measured by years, but by achievements, and his life work is done and well done. His brain is still; his voice is hushed; his hands are numbed, but the influence of that life work will go on forever, inciting to new effort by its example, blessing new generations with its results.

Every moment dies a man, Every moment one is born.

For every such noble life as that of our late fellow-member that thus goes up to its reward, there come down to earth a score of such spirits by the ragged rent through which the glad soul clove its way through Heaven's dome in its impatient flight. Though we do not lack for statesmen, patriots, and friends here, the place of our late colleague will never be filled in our hearts, for our heads will be low in the dust before the good spirit that came to earth to compensate for him shall have matured for life's noblest actions, highest purposes, and needed work.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly agree with all that has been so well said, by the distinguished gentlemen who have preceded me, with reference to the character and public services of Mr. Mutchler, and it must be gratifying indeed to the friends and family of our deceased brother to hear the tribthe friends and gamily of our deceased brother to hear the tributes to his memory which have been paid by gentlemen representing both the great political parties of this country which we have heard here to-day. Too much, in my judgment, can not be said in reference to the high character and noble work of our deceased friend.

Pope in his immortal Essay on Man says: Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow.

It is not great wealth, it is not so-called royal blood, it is not learning, or official position that makes the true man. It is a life of noble deeds, of true manhood, of unselfish devotion to family, to home, and country, and a walk and conversation void of offense that constitute true worth. Such was the life of our deceased brother, to commemorate whose virtues we have, for deceased brother, to commemorate whose virtues we have, for the time, suspended public business. I desire to add my tribute to his worth, and will be as brief as possible.

William Mutchler was born in Northampton County, Pa., nearly sixty-two years ago. There he grew up to manhood and there he died. He was attached to his home, and never left it to seek his fortune elsewhere. He belonged to a race of people who have made Pennsylvania what it is to-day—a great Commonwealth, the second State in the Union. They had a language of their own, which is known as Pennsylvania Dutch, "a dialect of South Germany with an infusion of English." The word "Dutch" as applied to this language and to these people is a misnomer, for it does not imply a Holland origin.

The early settlers of Pennsylvania came from South Germany and the Upper Rhine and the Neckar regions. They met in Peunsylvania and mingled with English-speaking colonists, and the two languages became merged into a dialect, which was neither German nor English, but a language greatly resembling neither German nor English, but a language greatly resembling both of the others. The language was characteristic of the peo both of the others. The language was characteristic of the people. It was simple, but strong, perfectly adapted to a people of plain habits and striking personality. Mr. Mutchler was a typical Pennsylvanian. He was a plain, unassuming, quiet, dignified gentleman. He was all that he assumed to be, and more than that. He was better than he appeared to be. So modest and unassuming was he that one might have been with him and near him for years without discovering one-half his merit, or learning but little of his true worth.

He was a lawyer by profession, and his mind was clear and his reasoning logical. He was well informed in history, in political economy, and in the useful sciences. He was eminently practical and always thorough and conscientious in the investigation of legal, political, or economic subjects. He held responsible public positions in his own State before his advent into Congress, and always performed his official duties faithfully and with due regard to the public interests. He served ten years as a member of this House, and was elected a member of this Congress, but died before the first session assembled. His constituents paid a high but deserved tribute to his memory by electing his worthy son to be his successor. If the father could appear among his people again he would doubtless assure them that, in thus honoring his son, they had conferred the highest honor and greatest satisfaction upon him.

Mr. Mutchler's Congressional career was not continuous. He first appeared in the Forty-fourth Congress, when I first made hisacquainance as we entered that Congress together. Ilearned during the exciting scenes of that Congress, being the Congress that settled the contest between Tilden and Hayes for the Presthat settled the contest between Tilden and Hayes for the Presidency, to admire him for his fidelity to his party, for his quiet and gentlemanly demeanor, and for his strong and manly churacter. He was not elected to the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, nor to the Forty-ninth or Fiftieth. These breaks in his Congressional career interfered greatly with his promotion in committee service, for custom assigned him to the position of a new member at each new appearance. But his usefulness was not impaired or his worth less appreciated by those who knew him. He was always faithful to the public weal, prompt in attendance, and thorough in his committee and legislative work.

Those who knew him best loved him most. He was a devoted husband, a kind father, an honest and able statesman. He was devoted to his family, to his friends, to his State, and to the whole country. He was faithful to every trust confided to him. He performed every duty that devolved upon him. He lived the life of an honest man, a good citizen, and a true patriot. His death is deplored by all who knew him.

We who knew him as a brother member of this House have especial reason to mourn his loss; we miss his wise counsels, his good government. Our loss, however, will be his gain. He rests from his labors. He has gone to reap the reward of those who, while living, loved their fellow-men. With such, all must be well, not only in this mortal life, but in the higher and nobler life beyond the tomb.

I can not close this brief tribute to his memory more appro-riately than by quoting the tender words of the Quaker poet,

Whittier:

He has done the work of a true man; Crown him, honor him, love him, Weep over him tears of woman, Stoop manifest brows above him.

No duty could overtask him, No need his will outrun; Or ever our lips could ask him, His hands the work had done.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I regret that circumstances have operated to prevent me from offering any extended observations on the life and character of William Mutchler. I can not allow the occasion to pass, however, without a single word.

My acquaintance with the deceased began in the Forty-lighth Congress. The friendship established then was strengthened as by hooks of steel in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses through the intimate relations incident to fellow-membership on the Committee on Appropriations.

Our friend was an effective speaker, clear, vigorous, and logical in the statement of a proposition; but it was in the painstaking deliberations of the committee room that he appeared, as it seemed to me, to best advantage. In that relation he was tireless in energy, impartial in consideration, just in judgment, and delightful in social qualities. His conclusions upon all questions before that great committee, which provides for the expenditure of the larger part of the people's money, always commanded respectful attention at the hands of his colleagues. He was a loving father, a true friend, a patriotic citizen, and a wise, conscientious legislator.

Our friend worked diligently, achieved nobly, and passed away while yet in the prime of his usefulness.

Life! I know not what thou art, But this I know, that thou and I must part; And when or where or how we meet, I own to me's a secret yet.

Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather.
"Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps' t will cost a sigh, a tear—
Then steal away—give little warning,
Choose thine own time, say not "Good night!"
But in some brighter clime bid me "Good morning!"

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, sharing the very common illusion that words are a proper mode of testifying our sense of loss, when a friend whom we loved, or a public character whom the country can ill afford to lose, is called away, I embrace the op-portunity which the occasion affords to add my feeble tribute to the eloquent, graceful, and touching words which have already been said concerning the character and public services of our departed friend, to add one little flower to the chaplet with which respect, esteem, and affection have garlanded his memory. In this world, Mr. Speaker, we meet with no other event so profoundly impressive as death. It is useful to survivors only as they comprehend its lessons. This may excuse the public oceasion we make of the ceremonies commemorative of the character and services of departed members of this House, justifying in this conspicuous fashion, and raising into public notice, over this new-made grave, illustrious examples of private worth and public usefulness.

Those whose acquaintance with our distinguished friend com-mission them to speak only of those excellencies of character which found their illustration in an interesting and distin-quished career in the service of his country, which he decorated and adorned with strict fidelity and disinterested devotion, find an inviting subject for eulogy and a deserving example to extol in the public ear.

It seems, from what has been said on the floor to-day, that William Mutchler was a self-made man. Whatever eminence he attained was due to an earnest and courageous effort to make the most of the endowments that had been given him under the stimulating inspiration of high and noble ideals. Every success stimulating inspiration of high and noble ideals. Every success he achieved was a victory over difficulties which, to him, were always incentives to exertion. Every distinction he won was a triumph in honorable encounter. In every struggle he was doubly armed, for he never contended without feeling a sense of the justice of his cause. He fought with honest weapons, and nobly won or nobly lost; brought back from every field of encounter, or was brought back on a stainless shield of honorable defense.

From what I have heard here to-day and from my own observation of his career, among the attributes which summed up a strong character and a vigorous personality, there are a few traits preëminently worthy to be set before the world as examples, and these are expressed by the words honor, courage, and duty. These were the precious and conspicuous jewels in the crown of his character, and I set them apart to-day and lift them over his new-made grave into public notice as the golden texts in the lesson of his life.

Honor, Mr. Speaker, is the noble mind's distinguishing perfection; and I have the happiness to believe that in no age of the world has this perfection been so much in fashion in public life as now. Still, occasional notable exceptions which strew our public life, emphasize the beauty and excellence of that high sense of public probity which makes this perfection ofttimes blaze in the public eye, in public servants who, like the virtuous Andrew Fletcher, would give their lives to serve their country, but would not do a base thing to save it. Our departed friend was the soul of honor, and in this distinguished excellence of his character his example should be both cherished and commended.

character his example should be both cherished and commended.

I think also that Mr. Mutchler's courage was conspicuous. The only Aladdin's lamp that he ever knew was the quenchless fire of a heroic soul that no difficulty ever daunted. age never wavered before an adverse cast of fortune.

He despised servility; he spurned the collar of the master. His conscience was his harness; he wore no other. The crack of the boss's whip filled him, not with cringing terror, but with sharp, back-striking resentment. He hated the "thrift that fol-lows fawning." He walked erect in the majesty, dignity, and conscious rectitude of his manhood.

In this elevated arena in which he spent many years of useful service and which was the scene of his latest and best exertions, he evinced on more than one occasion the virile qualities which have their root in a manly courage. When inspired by conviction and commanded by duty he was a heroic fighter. The man who broke a lance with him was likely

To know the joy that warriors feel In foemen worthy of their steel.

But he had none of the pride that is ashamed to yield when convicted of error; none of the obstinancy that delights in contention for its own sake. He never wasted the public time in needless words. He had the amazing courage to leave off when he was done, an example which statesmen of high and low degree might imitate with profit to their own and their country's

Then we have a right, Mr. Speaker, to infer from what has been so fittingly said of him that our friend has been twice ennobled. Duty and death ennoble all men. Promptitude and unremitting attention to his public duties were conspicuous traits of his character. To William Mutchler the command of duty was a "Thus saith the Lord."

In this excellence of his character he emulated the fidelity of the shipmaster in the story, who in the midst of storms ever kept his rudder true. And his entire life exemplified the truth that the path of duty is always the upward way; that—

Not once or twice in our fair land's story The path of duty was the way to glory.

My soul, Mr. Speaker, bows in adoration before the human temple that enshrines the divinity of duty. These superb characters are the rarest fruit of earth, and their surviving countrymen ought to garner the fine vintage of their example for their perpetual refreshment.

So I say in conclusion, to all whom it may concern here or elsewhere: Time-server, demagogue, politician, calculator, stand aside! A faithful public servant, and an honest man, passes to

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in rising to take the very brief part in this memorial service, which alone is possible for me, I respond not less to the suggestions of public duty than to the prompting of private friendship. Had I known Mr. Mutchler only in his public and official character, I should feel myself fully justified in speaking of him in words of high and unfeigned eulogy. But it was my privilege from my first entrance in this House to know him well; to welcome him after a brief retirement, back into its membership, and during all this paried to associate with him on terms of cordial friendship. all this period to associate with him on terms of cordial friendship. To myself, as to all in the circle of his intimate friends, his death has been a personal bereavement; but I am not less convinced that it has been to his district, to his State, and to his country a great public loss, and it is to William Mutchler, the member Congress, rather than to the man and friend, that our chief tribute here is due and fitting.

As a legislator he belonged to that class who take up public service as a grave and serious commission; who meet its demands with a strong and constant sense of personal duty; who give to with a strong and constant sense of personal duty, who give to public questions their best and sincerest thought, and who deal with them, not in the spirit of self-seeking, but of dedication to the welfare of their country. Such men wear well at home, and grow in influence in this Hall. No one ever heard Mr. Mutchler speak here without knowing he was listening to the utterances of an honest man, not the honesty of ignorance or narrowness, or the conclusions of haste and carelessness, but the expressions of a thoughtful mind, guided by broad and patriotic principles and enlightened by a wide and patient examination of facts.

Such a man faced his public duties with simplicity and bravery. Of this the country had a signal illustration in the last Congress, when as chairman of a subcommittee it fell to Mr. Mutchler's lot to prepare and attempt to carry through this House some re-forms of our pension system. He failed in his effort, as any other man would have failed; but few who witnessed the long struggle will forget his quiet firmness, his thorough equipment for his task, and the unfaltering courage with which he took up day after day and attempted to perform an unpopular duty; and to myself it is a pleasant thought that, having watched him daily in this invidious work, I suggested and secured some acknowledgment of his efforts in one of the leading papers of the coun-

But I will not dwell on his merits or his unblemished record as a public servant. He was faithful to his trust, and what higher epitaph can be inscribed on any man's monument? He have higher that intelligent, earnest, and patriotic representawas a thoughtful, intelligent, earnest, and patriotic representa-tive of his people, and their long retention of him in their service as a man and friend Mr. Mutchler had the sterling virtues of kindliness, sincerity, and truth.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the House having paused from its current labor to do honor to the memory of the departed member, Mr. Mutchler of Pennsylvania, I shall avail myself of the opportunity to join in the tributes that are being offered to his character and his worth, as well in his individual as in his representative capacity.

To those of us who knew him in this Hall and in the rooms of the committees to which he was assigned Mr. Mutchler was one who possessed our entire confidence. His every statement was always accepted as the very language of truth, and upon the correctness of his judgment we were accustomed to rely with entire safety. He gave to his duties at this capital a conscientious and untiring industry, and every question that claimed his consideration was so carefully and so thoroughly investigated in all its phases that his conclusions were received as those of a man who was not only willing but entirely able to speak the truth in its entirety.

His manners were simple and natural, his courtesy to every one was unfailing, and his kindliness of disposition gave confidence to all who approached him. Added to these social graces, which he possessed in an eminent degree, was an unyielding integrity of character that never forgot itself, whatever the presence in which he chanced to stand or however potent the influence that was brought to bear upon him. Rigid in his ideas as to personal propriety and as to professional and political conduct, he swerved neither to the right nor to the left, but courageously trod the path along which the uprightness of his character bade him travel.

His mind was well disciplined, and unless under extraordinary circumstances—and even then but seldom—never overleaped the restraints which a careful training had environed it to indulge in waywardness of fancy or intemperance of passion. His was a strong intellect, possessing the ability to absorb, to reflect, and to construct. His mental methods were entirely of a practical kind, looking rather to substantial and useful accomplishments than to those performances and creations which glitter and attract, melting away into airy nothingness. These qualities well fitted him to be a safe legal adviser and a wise legislator. Summing up his character, I knew him as a man of strong intellect, without superficial adornment, and of an unbending integrity, embellished with an unusual grace of manner and an attractive softness of disposition in his whole intercourse with his fellows, of whatever degree in life.

It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to be associated with Mr. Mutchler during two Congresses upon the Committee on Appropriations, and during those years we were so thrown together upon terms of close intimacy that I learned to know him well. His career as a member of this House during the Fortyfourth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses was alike honorable to himself and to the great constituency which he represented. No constituency in all this country was better represented than the people by whom he was thus honored, and but few constituencies have been served as His reputation is solid and enduring, and the manner of his life at this great capital and the character of his work in this House illustrated an ideal republican simplicity and the highest and best type of wise, sagacious, and practical statesmanship. In his death not only his own district, not only the State of Pennsylvania, but the entire Union has suffered a great loss. Few are the men that could not have been better spired than he.

Others, Mr. Speaker, well acquainted with him prior to his Others, Mr. Speaker, well acquainted with him prior to his coming here, have spoken and will speak of Mr. Mutchler's earlier life, its struggles, its embarrassments and its successes. I shall content myself with speaking of him only as I knew him in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses. His entire career, from the field of hard manual labor to the judicial forum, where the greatest intellectual effort is required in order to attain permanent success, thence through the several gradations of official life until he reached this branch of the Federal Congress, is worthy the highest commendation, and furnishes to the aspiring sons of America a wellspring of hope and confidence that by strict integrity and constant labor the brightest and most substantial honors are surely within their reach, however most succential honors are surely within their reach, however unpromising the lines of their early youth.

And more than that, Mr. Speaker, it creates and sustains a well-grounded belief—aye, a sure certainty—in every American heart that under the influence and through the workings of our free institutions, men will continue to rise, as William Mutchler rose, to take part in our State and Federal councils and to shape and guide them for the welfare and for the happiness of the people. In all sincerity and in entire truth, therefore, can it be said of our deceased associate and friend that his life was, within its limits, a rich blessing to his people, a bright example to his colaborers and to those who are to follow him, a comfort to his friends and to his family. And finally it may be justly said of this strong but kindly man, that—

His life was gentle, and the elements So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. McALEER. Mr. Speaker, it was not my pleasure to have personally known the distinguished Representative from the Eighth district as long as some of my colleagues from Pennsylvania knew him.

But his name and fame were well known to the people of every city and town throughout the State. In conjunction with thousands of my fellow-citizens, I felt a just pride in the distinguished position held by Mr. Mutchler in the National Halls of of legislation; taking, as he did, a prominent place among its ablest statesmen. Mr. Mutchler was a man of decided convictions, and when he made up his mind to his course of duty, could no more be moved from it than could the hills of his own State. He was a Democrat from principle, believing implicitly in the teachings of his party. To him it was a source of great gratification that the district of which he was so long the honored Representative had never sent to this House any other than a Democrat to represent it since the foundation of the Govern-

Notwithstanding this firmness in his own convictions of what he regarded as those truths which would best perpetuate the in-terests of his country, he was always tolerant to those who differed from him, ever willing to concede to them the same rights which he desired for himself, believing they were governed by the same true principles of patriotism.

On first meeting Mr. Mutchler, after becoming a member of Congress, I was very much impressed with his simplicity of manner, his kindly disposition, and desire to assist by his aid and counsel those who were inexperienced.

No jealousy ever found its way into his warm and generous No jealousy ever found its way into his warm and generous heart. On the contrary, he was always ready to lend a helping hand in assisting a colleague. Coming, as I did, from a great city that required large appropriations for public improvements, I felt how invaluable his assistance, how unselfish his character. Although his energy, his influence, his untiring work accomplished vast results; he never sought the credit for himself. I never knew a man in public life who was more earnest, more conscientious in the discharge of his duties. While a Pennsylvanian with all the love for his native State which could not be surpassed, yet that strong and nativitic love for his male. surpassed, yet that strong and patriotic love for his whole country would at all times prompt him to promote the interests of the nation rather than his State alone.

Although for the past few years in feeble health his interest in public affairs never relaxed. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, one of the most important of the House, he never shrunk from performing his share of its arduous labors.

While many of us noticed his large frame fast wasting away, we could not believe that the hand of death was upon him, but looked for an early recovery. As we received messages of his condition from time to time, we hoped that in the quiet of his condition from time to time, we hoped that in the quiet of his own home, with a loving and devoted wife to look after his every comfort, that his health would be restored. Vain hope! Day by day he continued to grow weaker, and finally passed away as gently as a summer's day. When I attended his funeral I was much impressed by the thousands of people who lined the streets of his beloved Easton to catch the last glimpse of all that remained of their honored neighbor and friend. Sad, indeed, was this, each and every one giving vent to their feelings as they recognized this to be the last of all on earth.

At his own request he was buried "as the sun went down" beneath the hills he loved so dearly, and will sleep the sweet sleep of neace until the resurrection morn.

of peace until the resurrection morn.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Pennsylvania delegation who had the privilege of serving with Mr. Mutchler during the Fifty-second Congress, I can not allow this occasion to pass without adding a few words as a tribute to his memory in addition to what has been so well said by others.

Mr. Mutchler deservedly was for many years considered a leader of his party in Pennsylvania. He was cool, clear-headed, and conservative, having the good of his party and the people of his State at heart. His counsel was always sought after and had great weight with all who came in contact with him. He was naturally and without effort looked up to as a counselor and

He was a Democrat from principle and believed religiously that his party embodied the true principles of a representative form of government. He believed the success of his party was essentiated in tial to good government and the prosperity of the whole country. He was a true, honest, and fearless man in whatever position placed. He had convictions of his own upon every subject which came before him, they controlled him and he was not afraid to express them, regardless of any public clamor or any fear of public opinion. He despised demagogy in every form from the bottom of his heart. One of the strongest elements of Mr. Mutchler's character was his constitutional disposition to be fair to everyone.

No person, whether an opponent in his own party, or of the opposing political party could ever accuse him of duplicity or deception. He always took his position, gave his reasons and maintained them, fearlessly and in such open and unmistakeable manner that every one knew where to find him on all occasions. It was this trait of character perhaps more than any other that endeared him to friend and foe alike. He was loyal to his friends and fair to every one. He naturally despised ambush, deception and trick of every kind, but respected an open and fearless ad-

This trait of character won for him the respect and confidence of his associates in Congress of every political faith. His party honored and respected him throughout his own State, and the people of his own district had frequently honored him with a seat in this body. His long service here had made him familiar with his duties as a member, and made him not only a faithful representative of the people of his district and the people of his State, but a valuable member of this body, and one whose advice was sought after, and whose untimely death will be regretted by all alike.

Mr. Mutchler was a plain, unassuming man, not demonstrative. He dealt in facts, and was always equipped with good reasons to justify his acts. He accomplished what he undertook by steady progress it his work and intensity of purpose. He made no pretensions to oratory, but none surpassed him in making his points clearly understood and in carrying conviction to those who gave him their attention.

His personal, professional, and political integrity was beyond the reach of suspicion. This was the foundation of his influence.

of suspicion. This was the foundation of his influence with the people of his State and district. In his unexpected death this body, the people of his State and district have suffered a loss which will be long felt, and to us who knew him long and honored him for his ability, integrity, and fairness, his memory will always be dear.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the death of William Mutchler, so long an honored member of this House, his friends have lost a sincere, generous, and unselfish friend, his constituents who stood by him with unfaltering confidence for so many years, a wise counsellor and an accomplished Representative, and the graph of the country one of the most valuable of its citizens awards. whole country one of the most valuable of its citizens engaged in public affairs.

I first became acquainted with Mr. Mutchler at the opening of the Forty-fourth Congress. I think I was introduced to him by Samuel J. Randall, who so long and honorably represented in this House one of the districts of Pennsylvania, and by his great abilities and unswerving integrity honored his State and his country. From my first acquaintance with Mr. Mutchler until we parted at the close of the Fifty-second Congress we were friends. It was always a joy for me to meet the frank, kindly, and courteous gentleman. How often have I left my seat in the House to visit his, that I might get his views on current affairs! I never consulted Mr. Mutchler without being benefited and in-

There was nothing sensational in his methods. As a speaker there was in his style no attempt at what is called oratory, no flights of fancy; he was content with submitting facts, but he presented his facts, and thejust and fair conclusions to be drawn from them, with a force and clearness I have seldom if ever seen excelled in this Hall.

Mr. Mutchler only occasionally addressed the House; he seldom mingled in the running and generally unprofitable debates which constantly occur, but whenever he addressed the House he at once commanded the respectful attention of members on both sides of this Chamber. He always spoke with deliberation; he spoke as if the matter he presented was of such value the House would be glad to hear him; and the House always heard him with pleasure, even if his views were not accepted by the

There was such a manifest sincerity and truthfulness in his speeches, such a manifest effort to present the facts, without any attempt or appearance of willingness to obscure the truth, that commanded the respect and confidence of the members.

He was, as a Representative in Congress, as he was in social life, a straightforward, courteous, and accomplished gentleman, valuing truth and honor as beyond all price.

He was devoted to his country, and as a legislator he was controlled and animated by a high sense of its greatness. He be-lieved that it was the duty of its representatives, under all conditions, to uphold its honor.

He was hostile to every form of favoritism in legislation, and demanded for the whole people equality of rights.

I think this is a just expression of the views of Mr. Mutchler, as expressed in this House during the long period of his service, as to the scope and duty of the Federal Government. He adhered with unfaltering fidelity to the views of Thomas Jefferson in relation to the powers of the Federal system and the rights of the States.

But my admiration of the character of William Mutchler was greatly increased during the last Congress. I had the honor, as then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, after conof that committee on Appropriations, after con-sultation with him, and with his approval, and with the approval of that committee, to place him at the head of one of the lead-ing subcommittees of that committee, having in charge one of the most important appropriation bills before that Congress. Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, a gentleman of the same sto qualities of courage and manhood that characterized Mr. Mutch ler, was one of his associates.

Mr. Mutchler believed that radical reforms should be organized in the branch of the public service under his charge. I did not wholly sympathize with him in the reforms he aimed at, I saw with unbounded satisfaction his patient and untiring industry month after month in pursuing his investigations. He became the complete master of our pension system, and made a masterly presentation of the subject to the House.

It was manifest that it was indifferent to him whether the views which he found himself compelled to express were, for the time, popular or not. He was manifestly controlled by the single sentiment of what was just and proper as between the soldiers of the former wars and the whole people.

The House was manifestly against him, yet I have seldom, if ever, seen the House listen so closely as to the speech he deliv-

In my last conversation with Mr. Mutchler he expressed views in relation to Federal traation for the support of the Government which greatly interested me. He had intended to bring them to the attention of the present Congress. They were such views as would give honor to a strong, able, and conscientious man dealing with a great public subject. I need not enter into the details

When I heard of his sickness and death my sadness was greatly increased by the fact that his powerful aid in behalf of a financial policy of the Government, which he was confident would be beneficial to the country, and in which I fully concurred with him, was forever lost.

But William Mutchler, the clear-headed, conservative legislator, always honest and sincere, is dead. The death of such a man in the prime of life, a pure, upright, honest man, fully informed in all that pertains to the interest and welfare of his country, is a sad event from the standpoint of human intelli-gence, but those who believe that the soul of man is immortal, and that there is an overruling Providence, an Infinite Spirit, which guides and directs the whole frame of the universe, in all of its limitless details, as I do, will see in the death of William Mutchler only the loss and sadness of an earthly parting. A good man is dead after years of usefulness to his fellow-men and his country. What loftier realms of life have been opened to him, and soon will be to us all, the future only will disclose.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the eighteenth century, when the wave of immigration from the Rhine Palatinate was flowing towards the shores of the New World, came the ancestors of William Mutchler, and found a new home

Inured to bardships in the trials and difficulties of the struggle to subdue the wild woods of Nature, and to bring under control the fertile soil, the early settlers soon developed the character of the Pennsylvania German.

Of strong and stately physique, they are swift in charity and helpfulness—slow in anger. Lacking in the power of aggression and domination, they are forceful and masterful in attaining their ends and purposes by their quiet persistence.

Humane, in so much that the barns on their fields are as palaces compared with the shelter of some people; so generous that the cheer of their households has become proverbial. Industrious, God-fearing, plain, they have increased and multiplied until to-day their number is millions.

In naming the virtues of this people that he loved so well, I have described Mr. Mutchler. Of them he was a true type. In early life he was permitted to enjoy but sparingly the advantages of a great institution of learning reared near by many years ago. While this was a source of great regret to him, often so expressed, yet his strong intellect was matured and his mind well fortified by constant reading, observation, and reflection.

Overcoming difficulties which might have appalled men of less force and energy, he found his way to the bar.

As a lawyer and active practitioner he soon acquired a large clientage, and became a confidential adviser, safe and reliable, rather than a brilliant orator.

His rare sound judgment and ripe legal attainments, brought him success and distinction at home and in the appellate tribunal of his State.

While it may not have been his ambition, yet it was the judgment and purpose of his friends, knowing full well that he possessed all the qualifications, that he should round out the full measure of his useful life on the bench.

Endowed by nature with great personal magnetism and those qualities which make enduring friendships, he entered the field of politics. He rose step by step, ever retaining the confidence and esteem of his people by an honest and conscientious observance of his duties.

Rectitude, fidelity, and courage marked his public life. When once he saw the right his duty became plain, and he never fal-tered. Affectation and hollow pretense were as obnoxious to him as sincerity and frankness were admired. Had he lived it was his purpose to spend much of his time in the further investigation of pensions. Actuated by the purest motive, liberal and generous towards the deserving, he had the courage to climinate fraud and corruption.

I recall how, on a dreary night in the past winter, when the subject under discussion was the great mystery of life and death, infinity and eternity, he suddenly exclaimed: "We soon shall know it all."

He knows it now. Death has led him into the realm of light. On a quiet afternoon in June there assembled a vast concourse of his neighbors in the city of Easton to pay him the last trib-The farmer took a brief respite from his plow, the artisan from his hammer, and the mechanic from his machine. Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen who desired to speak upon this occasion have been unavoidably detained from the House, and I ask unanimous consent that they and such other gentlemen as desire to do so may be granted leave to print remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that general leave to print be granted?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. I now move the adoption of the resolutions as read from the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were agreed to; and in accordance with the terms thereof (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 20, at 12 o'clock noon.

entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 10 o'clock and 17 minutes a. m.).
Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 1.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to state that there is necessity for a short executive session by the Senate, and at the proper time I shall make a motion to that effect; but before doing so, in order to accommodate the convenience of Senators, I desire unanimous consent that a short time may be occupied in the transaction of such morning business as Senators desire to present. When that is completed, I give notice that I shall make a mo-

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 920) to pension Mary Brown, of Berlin, Vt., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1104) to facilitate the collection of debts payable to the United States from Government-aided railroad companies and to enforce the accountability of directors of said companies, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 1105) for the relief of Albert

E. Redstone; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 1106) for the relief of certain property owners in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1107) providing for the acquisition of certain land in Webb County, Tex., in lieu of the site of Fort McIntosh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1108) for the relief of George W.

Barnes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations

He also introduced a bill (S. 1109) for the erection of a public building at Laredo, Tex.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1110) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund certain duties paid by James J. Haynes; which was read twice by its title, and re-ferred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1111) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant a permit to build on lot 43, square 358, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1112) to provide for a survey for a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS. May I inquire of the Senator from Virginia if the bill proposes a survey for a bridge across navigable waters?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir, I was so informed, and hence I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS. If navigable waters, of course it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce, but otherwise it should go the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1113) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1114) for the relief of George S.

Ayre; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. MORGAN. I now move to refer Senate bill 1093, which I

Mr. MORGAN. I now move to refer Senate bill 1993, which I offered the other day, to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. It will be remembered that the bill was held up, printed, and the question of reference was left open.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.
The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1993) to provide for the control of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company until the debts due and to fall due from each of said corporations to the United States are fully paid up or secured.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF CHINESE LABORERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, concerning the attitude of the Government of China with regard to an extension of time for the registration of Chinese laborers in the United States under the act of May 5, 1892, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State on the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, October 18, 1893.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read, printed, and laid over for subsequent action of the Senate. In doing so, I desire to say that it is substantially the resolution heretofore presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], but contains some additions thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read. The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed to the rules of the Senate, viz: Add to Rule IX the following section:

"Sec. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business, and the same shall have been debated on divers days, anounting in all to thirty days, it shall be in order for any Senator at any time to move to fix a time for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately puss, and if passed by a majority of all the members of the Senate, the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be had at the date fixed in such original motion wishout further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent; and during the pendency of such motion to fapt date and also at the time dixed by the Senate for voting upon such bill or resolution no other motion of any kind or character shall be entertained unit such motion or such bill or resolution shall have been finally voted upon."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

MARSHALS' EXPENSES IN NEW YORK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions," the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr KYLE, October 16, 1893, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate, as soon as may be practicable, a statement in writing of the expenses incurred by John W. Jacobus, United States marshalf or the southern district of New York, on account of deputy, assistant deputy marshals, and special deputy marshals, appointed by him, the said John W. Jacobus, in and about the Presidential and deputy marshals, and special deputy, assistant deputy marshals, and special deputy marshals, together with their names and amounts of such payments to each.

Mr. VOORHEES. In asking unanimous consent for the transaction of morning business, I did not intend that it should apply to matters of that kind, coming over. I made the request for the convenience of Senators, so as to enable them to get rid of their routine morning business, but not for the transaction of business like the resolution which has just been read, which will lead to discussion. I did not contemplate the introduction of such business, and I shall object to its consideration. The request I made did not go that far.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section No. 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, to report it without amendment. There is the processing the property of the bill, and I are in the processing of the bill. is an immediate necessity for the passage of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of Mr. VOORHEES. I must object until I know whether the bill will lead to discussion. I think it probably will. I shall confer with the Senator to see if we can not agree as to a time for its consideration; but just at this moment I do not feel that I can yield.

Mr. STEWART. It is very important that the bill should be passed immediately, otherwise no benefit will be derived from it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the bill is before the Senate, I desire to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the amendment be offered, but not be discussed at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by adding:

Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to individuals who are bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which the mining claim is located.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to say to the Senator from

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to say to the Senator from Indiana that I hope no objection may be made to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will it lead to discussion?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I was about to state, if I may be permitted, that the bill is one which I think will lead to no discussion. There is an important amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. Permigreew), which he are I understand. South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew], which he, as I understand, has very generously offered to submit to a vote without argument. Some action is imperatively necessary. has very generously offered to submit to a vote without argument. Some action is imperatively necessary. We get thousands of letters from the mining States respecting the necessity for modifying the law requiring the payment of annual assessments. The money is not there with which to pay the assessments; the people can not afford to buy the food necessary to sustain and take care of them while they are engaged in doing this prospecting work; they can not buy the powder, the fuses, and the tools which are necessary, and I sincerely believe that the bill can be disposed of in ten minutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have this suggestion to make, if the Senator will bear with me, that we shall have a short executive session, and when we come out of executive session and the regsession, and when we come out of have no doubt we can take up the measure in which the Senator is interested and pass it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and twenty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senate to take up for considera-tion the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I offered, and to submit an amendment in its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY In line 19 after the word "claim" insert

The SECRETARY. In line 19, after the word "claim," insert the following additional proviso:

Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to natural persons who are bona fide residents of the State or Territory, or adjoining States or Territories, in which the mining claim is located.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Beit enseted, etc., That the provisions of section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements mad during each year, be suspended for the year 1896 so that no mining claim which has been regularly located and recorded as required by the local laws and mining regulations shall be subject to forfeiture for nonperformance of the annual assessment for the year 1893: Provided, That the claimant or claimants of any mining location, in order to secure the benefits of this act, shall cause to be recorded in the office where the location notice or certificate is filed on or before December 31, 1893, a notice that he or they, in good faith, intend to hold and work said claim: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to natural persons who are bona fide residents of the State or Territory, or adjoining States or Territories, in which the mining claim is located. This act shall take offect from and after its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amend-

The motion was agreed to. By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. Stew-ART, Mr. PETTIGREW, and Mr. BATE were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House h d passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department;

A bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona:

A bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiences in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair mays before the School the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act, approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Preserval is entitled to the floor.

PEFFER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before proceeding with my remarks I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator

Mr. PEFFER. Is an amendment to the pending amendment now in order? I wish to offer an amendment in order that I may eak to it as I proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can offer the amendment he has suggested. Mr. PEFFER. Then Mr. PEFFER. Then I move the amendment which I send to the desk—not giving notice that it shall be offered, but offering

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The Secretary. After the word "repealed," at the end of line 13 in the amendment of the Committee on Finance, insert:

line 13 in the amendment of the Committee on Finance, insert:

SEC. 2: That any owner of gold bullion or silver bullion in condition fit for collage, and of the coined value of $50 or more, may deliver the same at any mint to the proper officers thereof, and it shall be formed into coins for the benefit of the depositor in the manner provided by the set of Congress approved January 18, 1837, and in all respects according to the provisions of said act, all of which provisions, so far as the same are or may be applicable hereto, are hereby revived and refnacted, except that the inscriptions and devices of coins of like denominations now current shall be placed on the coins authorized by this act, and double eagles may be coined as provided in the act of February 12, 1873.

SEC. 3. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect and be in force thirty days after its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the commit-

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Chair that the amendment just submitted by the Senator from Kansas is an amendment to the original bill, and not an amendment to the original bill, and not an amendment to the pending amendment. It can not be, in the nature of the amendment itself.

Mr. PEFFER. I am not particular how it is regarded, so that it will take its proper place in the discussion. My object is to have the first vote taken upon this amendment; and I will take this occasion to state the difference between the amendment I now offer and the one I proposed some time ago, and which was disposed of in the last vote.

This amendment provides for the coinage of double eagles according to the provisions of the act of 1873, and it makes no reference whatever to the coinage of half dimes. Under my former amendment half dimes were excepted and no notice was taken of double eagles.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be printed.

Mr. FEFFER resumed his speech. After having spoken one hour and three-quarters,
Mr. FAULKNER said: If the Senator from Kansas will permit me to interrupt him, I will submit a motion for a recess.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kansas permit the interruption of the Senator from West Virginia?
Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.
Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 celebit to meanous.

R. 1918) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Calcasieu and Sabine Rivers, in the States of Louisiana and Texas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees. The merning hour for the consideration of bills begins at seventeen minutes past 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Territories, which has a bill pending, the title of which the Clerk will report.

RAILROAD STATIONS, ETC., IN THE TERRITORIES.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I shall use a few minutes of that time in replying to the attack upon the Secretary of the Interior made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNNI

I regret that the gentleman has seized this opportunity to make very unjust charges against the honorable Secretary of the Interior.

He says that the Secretary did injustice to the white settlers by allowing the Indians to monopolize and take up lands in ad-

If the gentleman had taken the trouble to inform himself he would have learned that the treaty with the Indians of the 19th of December, 1891, by which the Cherokee Strip was acquired, provided for these allotments of 70 tracts of land of 80 acres each to the Indians, and that the law specially provided that these allotments might be selected by the Indians. The language of the treaty with regard to these allotments is as I will

It is further agreed and understood that the number of such allotments shall not exceed 70 in number, and the land alloted shall not exceed 5,600 acres: "bat such allotments shall be made and confirmed under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and when so made and confirmed shall be conveyed to the allottees respectively by the United States in fee simple.

In order to carry out this clause of the treaty, the law by which the Territory was opened provided thatThe allotments provided for in the fifth section of said agreement shall be adde without delay by the persons entitled thereto, and shall be confirmed as the Secretary of the Interior before the date when said lands shall be delared open to sattlement; and the allotments so made shall be published by he Secretary of the Interior, for the protection of proposed settlers.

This treaty was made and this law was enacted when the Sec. retary of the Interior was practicing law in Atlanta, Ga., and he had nothing whatever to do with this concession to the Indians.

The gentleman says that-

If deaths occur there by virtue of these opposing towns, each and murder, because they will be nothing less, must be laid at the doors. Interior Department.

The desire of the gentleman to unjustly assault the Secretary of the Interior is here manifested by his emphatic assertion that he intends to hold the Hon. Hoke Smith, of our honored Pres-ident's Cabinet, responsible for all deaths which may occur in the Territory by virtue of the fact that there happen to exist two towns separated by about 3 miles.

I did not intend to say one word in defense of the distinguished gentleman who presides so well over the Department of the Interior, but since the gentleman from Oklahoma has made it proper for me to do so, I will state that, owing to the administrative ability of that Cabinet officer, the delicate work of opening the Cherokee Strip was conducted with a much higher degree of good order than there was any possible reason to expect.

Imagine 100,000 to 150,000 persons brought together from all sections of our land, including, of course, many rough and hav-less people. They were crowded together, waiting for the given signal, eager to struggle for the coveted and valued prize, and signil, eager to struggle for the coveted and valued prize, and yet there was less ruffianism and fewer injuries to life and limb than often occur in the well-ordered city of Washington.

It is true there was some lawlessness, and some people hurt, and one man was killed by a guard; but so are people hurt and killed in Washington, New York, and Philadelphia.

The gentleman from Oklahoma should devote his time to compending the Secretary of the Interior, in the highest town.

mending the Secretary of the Interior in the highest terms, instead of soizing every opportunity to do him injustice.

Had it not been for the untiring efforts of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of War, and the well-conceived regulations which they prepared, great injustice would have been

Might would have triumphed overright; the weak would have been overcome by the strong, and most serious disturbances would certainly have occurred.

I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the committee appointed by the mayor and council in the town of Enid. It is as

Whereas, from the present indications, we are firmly convinced that the urgent necessity for the location of a depot here and the magnitude of the business being transacted from this place is being kept concealed from the directors and principal officers of said railroad company; Now, therefore.

It will be seen that this document states that 90 per cent of the passenger traffic to and from that county makes the town of Enid its destination; that 90 percent of the building material of Enid its destination; that so percent of the building material and all classes of freight shipped to that county is shipped to the business men and merchants of the town of Enid. It further states that the failure of the railroad to provide the necessary railroad facilities to meet the demands of trade at the town of Enid is an unwarranted injustice to the citizens who have settled there and made hope fide improvements and engaged in tled there and made bona fide improvements and engaged in

A survey and estimates were made about a week ago by the railroad company, which were given out to the public that it would cost between $80,000 and $100,000, which anyone knows is far in excess of what it would cost. I venture to say that the citizens of this place will or can put the roadbed in shape to receive the ties and rails at a cost of not to exceed $5,000.

I feel confident the House will not permit this wrong to the people of Enid to be continued. The bill should pass without a senting vote.

I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas

Mr. SIMPSON. I understood the Speaker to say that we had but eleven minutes. I wish to inquire whether that includes all the time we have for the passage of this bill; for if it does, I shall

The SPEAKER. The bill may be considered during the remainder of this hour. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who had already used a portion of his Allowing [Mr. Wherlier], who had already used a porton of his time on yesterday, had eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, there should be no opposition to the passage of this bill, and I trust that there will not be any when members understand the necessity for it. There seems to have been a struggle going on between the Government, as represented by the Interior Department, and the railroad corpora-

The railroad corporations, through their agents, have secured an amendment to the bill opening the Strip to settlement, pro-viding that the Indian agent should locate the Indians anywhere in the Territory, instead of confining them to the lands that they lived upon. There is where the whole trouble commenced. The railroad corporation in this case, in collusion with this man representing the Indians, have taken up the land around the places where the town sites were located, and left the Government no room for town sites, so that the Government, in self-defense, was forced to go 2 miles south and locate a new town site. The railroad corporation comes in here and wants to have this bill modified in such a way as to locate the stations, if not at their town sites, as near to them as possible.

Now, I hold that we are not here to defend the railroad corporations. We are here to look after the interests of the people. A large number of people have settled on these Govern-ment town sites, and taken up property there, and they look to the Government to protect their interests, by compelling the railroad corporation to erectdepots sufficient to meet their needs. I am surprised that members get up here, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Curtis] did yesterday, and want to delay this measure, to put it off until another day, until they can hear from these railroad corporations to see whether the bill is satisfactory to them or not. I do not think we are here to protect their interests. The railroad corporations so far in the history of this country have shown themselves sufficiently able to look after their own interests; let us take care of the interests of the peo-

It is a well-known fact through my country that the railroad corporations have gone into the town-site and town-booming business for years past. It is a well-known fact that they have controlled the government of the State of Kansas in years gone by; and the struggle in that State has been between the railroad corporations and the people. And I hold that the gentleman from Kansas is here to-day partly as a representative of the Santa Fe and Rock Island Railroad corporation, and I do not wonder that he comes up here to protect their interests. Mr. Speaker, in my district they colonized more than 7,000 negroes and kept them there six months at the expense of the railroad companies purposely to defeat me because I had presumed to stand in their

This is the struggle that is going on all over the country—a struggle on the part of the railroad corporations to control this Government. And they have shown their power, in the opening of the Cherokee Strip, to defeat the will of the people expressed through their representatives. The Secretary of the Interior has acknowledged that they have put obstacles in the way that are almost insurmountable. Now, I think it time that Representatives here in Congress should "sit down" upon this power. Of course this is but a small matter in comparison with some other things that these corporations have been making an effort to control in the way of legislation in their interest. But it only shows the increasing and dangerous power of these cor-porations in their effort to control the Government of the United States. I say this bill ought to pass, and the stations should be located at those new towns established by the Government; and we should set at defiance this power that is trying to use the Government of the United States in its own interest.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. You referred to a "gentleman from Kansas" being here representing the railroad companies. Did you mean me

Mr. SIMPSON. I meant you, because you showed it here yesterday when you told me individually that you wanted to wait and have this bill put off till you telegraphed back to see whether the bill was satisfactory.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. If you say that I represent any rall-road corporation, you utter a falsehood. Mr. SIMPSON. Whom did you want to telegraph to, if it was not a railroad corporation?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ransas [Mr. Simpson] has expired.

Mr. FLYNN. A good deal has been said on this floor in regard to the opinion of the Attorney-General (and it has been published in the RECORD) on what is alleged to have been the law that he was governed by. Now, I take it that there are some lawyers who are members of this body, and I wish to read what the law says; then gentlemen can put their own construction on the question whether or not this law meant that the Indian should the question whether or not this law meant that the Indian should take his farming land or that he should go and steal the railroad town sites. I read from the Presidential proclamation issued by the Interior Department:

Provided, That any citizen of the Cherokee Nation, who, prior to the 1st day of November. 1891, was a bona fide resident upon and further had, as a farmer and for farming purposes, made permanent and valuable improvements upon any part of the land so ceded and who has not disposed of the same, but desires to occupy the particular lands so improved as a homestead and for farming purposes, shall have the right to select one-eighth of a section of land, to conform however to the United States surveys; such selection to embrace, as far as the above limitation will admit, such improvements. The wife and children of any such citizen shall have the same right of selection that is above given to the citizen, and they shall have the preference in making selections to take any lands improved by the husband and father that he can not take until all of his improved by the husband and so ceded, who, prior to the lat day of November, 1891, had for farming purposes made valuable and permanent improvements upon any of the land so ceded, who, prior to the lat day of November, 1891, had for farming purposes made valuable and permanent improvements upon any of the land above limitation will admit, such improvements; but the allotments so provided for shall not exceed seventy in number, and the land allotted shall not exceed 5,600 acres; and such allotments shall be conveyed to the allottees such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and when so made and confirmed shall be deducted the sum of $1.40 for each acre so taken in allotment.

That is the law which gentlemen have been talking about

That is the law which gentlemen have been talking about. They have published in the RECORD the opinion of the Attorney-General. I appeal to you gentlemen here, who are lawyers, to place upon this law the interpretation that was placed upon it by the Interior Department if you can.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move the previous question on the amendments and the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to occupy two or three minutes before the gentleman moves the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. My time will expire in a few

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Perhaps by unanimous consent five or ten minutes more might be given to the gentleman, he still retaining the floor.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the time of the gen-tleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] will be extended ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in the time allowed me I shall ask attention to two or three matters. I am one of those Representatives living away from Oklahoma and knowing nothing about the merits of this bill except what we have been enabled to learn yesterday and to day on the floor of this House. I never heard of the measure before; therefore I think I am in a fair condition to vote for the bill if it ought to be enacted, and in a fair condition to vote against it if it ought not to be enacted. But it does seem to me strange that the bill contains the provisions that it does. It provides that these depots shall be erected at the town sites, which are from one to two or three miles from the railroad stations, which were located long ago—
Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Two and three-quarter miles. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. One, two, three, or four miles, as may be.

Mr. KRIBBS. Will the gentleman yield just there for a suggestion.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not now; I have but a few moments. I was going on to say that the bill provides these stations shall be erected and maintained in perpetuity. That is what your bill provides; so that, with railroad depots located all through the Cherokee Outlet, I apprehend wherever these railroads legally located them on lands which were purchased adjacent to the stations before the Outlet was thrown open, they are compelled under the provisions of this bill to maintain others at every town site within from 2 to 4 miles of the stations already located and maintained by themselves; and these latter stations duplicates of the others, the bill requires them to maintain in perpetuity, without reference to the needs of the public here-

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (interrupting). But the gentleman must remember that the town sites are located by the Government Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly; I understand that, but the Government has declared these to be town sites, in place of the points where the stations are located, and the town sites are within two to four miles from the railway stations.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Only one in the county, and four altogether. And the gentleman must remember that there are 4,000 people there.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Whether it be 1 or 4 miles it does not matter.

Now let me say, Mr. Speaker, all of these matters ought to be regulated, and if left to themselves would be regulated by the demands and business of the public.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me? Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not now. If I have a moment later on I will.

Now, I listened, not with profit or with pleasure, to the declamation of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Simpson]. I am not a special friend of the railroads. I own no share of stock in any of them. I am acquainted with no man connected with these particular roads, but I have no desire to oppress them merely because they are railroads, if this be oppression. They are entitled to their rights and to fair treatment under the law. the gentleman could have his way he would put an exaction on the railroads that in the long run would be charged over on the citizen or the settlers, those adjacent to the railroads who patronize the roads.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction of one part of his statement?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly, if I am in error.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman seems to be laboring under the impression that there is a town site where the original depot site was. That is altogether a mistake. Nobody was allowed to live in this part of the Territory except those who were necessary for the purpose of operating the railroad company's business, all others being shut out prior to its opening.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, I understand that. I think I understand the case as reported by the gentleman on yesterday. I read his remarks, I will state to him, with great care, and I find this to be a fact, as I gathered both from his remarks and from the bill itself, that you are requiring these railroad companies to do something that the ordinary requirements of their business do not call for

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, following up the statement which I made on yesterday, I desire to make just one more observation on another point in reference to the Indian allotments. The gentleman from Oklahoma has repeated as many as three times, twice on this floor and once before the Committee on Public Lands, that this Administration reversed a ruling of the last Administration relating to these allotments, in order that what he characterizes as a steal of these lands might become effectual. In this he is incorrect.

Those of us who were members of the last Congress, and remember the passage of the Cherokee Outlet bill, know that it was not passed until about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 4th of last March, though approved on the legislative day of the 3d. As a matter of fact, the late Secretary Noble never saw even the manuscript copy of the bill as finally passed. He went out of office the day the bill was signed without considering this question in anyway. And yet the gentleman insists that a ruling was made by the Interior Department under the last Administration that has been reversed by the present, by which the Indian allottees got an unfair advantage.

Mr. FLYNN. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not true that to do so in the morning hour.

everybody except Gen. Noble himself, the law officers of the last every body except deal. Robe initiating the law of the last Interior Department, did remain; and, as a matter of fact, Secretary Smith himself, upon their written opinions, signed this report prohibiting the Indians from stealing these lands?

Mr. McRAE. I have no information as to who remained in

Mr. MCRAE. I have no information as to who remained in the law department. The Secretary is the responsible head. If any Republicans were kept in, I think to that extent this Administration did wrong, and if the gentlemen who were retained led the Secretary into an error, I am not here to apologize for it; but, as a matter of fact, the last Administration made no rule the constitution of the constitution and the explanation that the gentlement ing upon this question, and the explanation that the gentleman now furnishes shows that he knows the Harrison Administration did not consider the question. But, Mr. Speaker, I deny that the present Secretary adopted any opinion prepared by the hold-over law officers. The opinion upon which he acted was prepared by Judge Hall, and is unanswerable.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move the previous question on the pending amendments and the bill to its engressment and

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] withdraw his demand?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; simply to have the amendment read

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his demand for the previous question, and the amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, in line 9, strike out "five hundred" and insert "fifty," so as to ead "said company shall be liable to a fine of $50 for each day," etc.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I now demand the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEEL-

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the amendment to the bill offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] pending?
The SPEAKER. It is not pending.
Mr. DINGLEY. Only read for information?
The SPEAKER. That is all. The question is upon ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the res seemed to have it.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas demanded a division; and there were-ayes 107, noes 3.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. No quorum.

Mr. CURTIS of Alabama. I demand the yeas and nays. Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I demand the yeas and nays. Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I withdraw the point of no quorum,

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pettigrew, and Mr. Bate as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The Committee on Private Land Claims was called.
Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the bill H. R. 415.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr.
PENDLETON] calls up a bill the title of which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1991, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purpose

The SPEAKER. This is a private bill, and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to raise the point of order that the gentleman from West Vicginia [Mr. PENDLETON] who has called up this bill was not authorized and instructed by the committee Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I was instructed by the committee to call it up at the first opportunity.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman some questions—to interrogate him on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might plead his privilege. Of course the Chair can not determine the fact without knowing more about it. The rule is, however, that on this call the committee may call up the bill for consideration. The language is: Upon which call each committee, upon being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day.

The Chair thinks, and the Chair has held heretofore, that this is not a personal privilege to a member of the House, but that it is a privilege to the committee to call the bill up, and that the committee should authorize it, or that the member should have the authority of the committee to call up the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I have the authority of the whole committee. They passed a resolution authorizing me to favorably report this bill, and then to call it up for the

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question-

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. No, I do not believe I will. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the statement of the gentleman does not bring him within the rule. I submit further that in order to bring him within the rule he must show that the committee specifically authorized him to call up show that the committee specifically authorized him to call up this bill in the morning hour.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the rule.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. PENDLETON] desire to say anything on that question?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I simply desire to say that the committee authorized me to call up this bill, and that I notified them at the time that I would call it up in the first morning hour that I could reach it, and I am acting under the instructions of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If the committee assented to that—

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me a bill which involves perhaps $30,000,000 ought not to be called up in the morning hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It does not cost the Government a cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It does not cost the Government a cent.
Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what the Chair understands to be the rule, and the gentleman from West Virginia can state whether his authority comes up to the rule as stated by the Chair. In dealing with the second morning hour, the rule can state whether his authority comes up to the rule as stated by the Chair. In dealing with the second morning hour, the rule says the Speaker shall again call committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have a right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day. Now, the Chair thinks that when a gentleman calls up a bill under this rule he ought to be expressly authorized by his committee so to do, because it is a privilege that is extended to the committee and not to any individual. If the committee is to do, of gentleman states he is authorized by his committee so to do, of sextended to the committee and not to any individual. If the gentleman states he is authorized by his committee so to do, of course, so far as the Chair is concerned, that is enough.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I understand that I have that authority, and I think that members of the committee present will sustain me in that statement.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the statement of the gentleman brings it within the rule.

Mr. DOCKERY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It will not be in order, as I understand, to raise the question of consideration against the motion the gentleman from West Virginia submits, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whols.

The SPEAKER. It will not be. The same end can be reached by voting down the metion to go into Committee of the Whole; but the question of consideration can not be raised.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the motion is voted down, consideration can not be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. Why, of course not, because the House will have refused to consider it by going into the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from West Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

ble?

The SPEAKER. It is not.
The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I demand a division. Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that this hour is set apart for

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this bill is subject to the point of order, that it must go into committee, is it not right for the member to have the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to nave the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider it?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House. The Chair can not order the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman is ordered by the committee to call it up in this hour, if it must be considered in Committee of the Whole, and this House does not resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, does not that mean that the House retreat a considered it? fuses to consider it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. This motion is the same in effect as a motion made by a gentleman to call up a bill which is in the House when a gentleman can raise the question which is in the House when a gentleman can raise the question of consideration against that.

Mr. SPRINGER. But that is in the House.

The SPEAKER. This is simply the sume thing, only in another form. You can not raise the question of consideration against this bill, because it is in committee. The only way you can accomplish what might be accomplished by raising the question of consideration in the refuse to gain to the Committee of the tion of consideration is to refuse to go into the Committee of the Whole, which would practically dispose of the case.

The House divided on the question of going into Committee of the Whole, and the Speaker announced that there were-

ayes 57, noes 53.

Mr. BOEN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. PENDLETON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BOEN] to act as tellers.

The House divided, and tellers reported 66 in the affirmative. Mr. BOEN. I withdraw the point of no quorum. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. Tellers have not yet reported the negative

Mr. BOEN. Thirteen voted in the negative.
The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted. Gentlemen desiring to vote will please come forward and do so.

After some further time spent in the count, The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 95, the noes 13. The morning hour has expired.

ADMISSION OF ARTICLES INTENDED FOR WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution 22 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 22, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr Speaker, I desire to make this statement. This resolution proposes to admit exhibits at the Exposition at one-half the rates of duty. I simply ask that it be considered in the House in order to save time. Mr. DINGLEY. This is very important, and I think it should

Mr. DINGLEY. This is very important, and I think it should be considered in the regular way, in Committee of the Whole. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine objects.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I trust the gentleman will not raise that objection.

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House of the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. The question is whether this is a bill raising for the consideration of bills for raising revenue. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Columbian Exposition.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the act ap proved April 23, 1880, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois," be, and the same is hereby, amended as to permit the sale and delivery, subject to the approval of the director-general, during the exhibition of goods, wares, and merchandise heretofore imported, and now in the Exposition buildings, subject to such additional regulations for the security of the revenue and the collection of the duties thereon as the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion prescribe.

Sec. 2. That the entire stock of each exhibitor, consisting of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported by him and now in said buildings, is hereby declared liable for the payment of duties accruing on any portion thereof, in case of removal of such portion from said buildings without the payment of the lawful duties thereon.

Sec. 3. That the penalties prescribed by, and the provisions contained in section 3082 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed and held to apply in case of any goods, wares, or merchandise now in said buildings, sold, delivered, or removed without the payment of duties, in the same manner as if such goods, wares, or merchandise had been imported contrary to law, and the article or articles so sold, delivered, or removed shall be deemed and held to have been so imported with the knowledge of the parties respectively concerned in such sale, delivery, or removal: Provided, That in the assessment of duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise, imported and now on exhibition at the World's Columbian Exposition, as authorized by the act approved fing an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in t

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that we are in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of consider-ing bills raising revenue, and that that is not a bill raising revenue. It merely rebates duties to a certain class of individuals.

To be a revenue bill it must apply generally.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite some authority on the point that he raises?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not had an opportunity to examine authorities. I did not suppose it would be claimed that this was a bill raising revenue. I think it would be very unfortunate that a bill of this character should be determined to be a bill raising revenue, entitled to be called up at any time. It is a bill simply in the interest of a certain class of individuals, and not a bill raising revenue within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It will raise revenue if it succeeds in keeping these good shere. If it does not pass, they will go back to the old countries from which they came.

Mr. DINGLEY. A bill remitting half the duty on certain goods belonging to a few individuals is hardly a bill raising revenue.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, this bill will raise revenue. I do not think there is any other gentleman in the House who takes the view of it taken by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me that if this is a bill raising revenue, any bill which remitted any duty to any individual would be a bill raising revenue.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to discuss this question. I think it is pretty well conceded that a reduction of the rate of taxation often increases the revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. If this were a general bill, the question would be entirely different.

Mr. BYNUM. Under the rules it is a bill raising revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is a bill which simply remits duties to certain individuals.

Mr. BYNUM. But that may result in raising more revenue.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The operation of the bill will be to raise revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is a matter of dispute.

Mr. BYNUM. All bills affecting the rates of duty are bills raising revenue under the rule. The fact that a bill reduces the rate of duty does not take it outside the rule at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. But this bill reduces the rates of duty only to a few individuals. If it were general it would be a revenue bill; but it is really in the nature of a private bill remitting duty only to a few individuals. If the gentleman's position is correct, a bill remitting duty to one individual would be equally a bill raising revenue, and that, I think, would be a dangerous position to assume.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the House has settled this question by resolving itself into Committee of the Whole House on state of the Union for the purpose of con-sidering this bill as a bill raising revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. No. The point could not be made until now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not been able to make a critical examination of the question raised by the gentleman from Maine, and is inclined to think that the question is not free from doubt; but, after such hurried consideration as he has been able to give, is of opinion the point of order should be over-

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, the joint resolution under con Mr. By NUM. Mr. Charman, the John restation under consideration is not a very extensive one, nor will it require, I apprehend, any considerable time for the House to dispose of it. The first information that members would naturally desire in order to be advised of the extent and scope of the bill would be as to the quantity of goods in bond at the Exposition which will likely be thrown upon the market if this bill shall pass. In order to procure for the House that information as nearly as it could be ascertained, I addressed an inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he, in turn, called upon the collector of the port of Chicago for a statement. I have here the report of the collector, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Custom-House, Chicago, Illa, Collector's Office, October 14, 1892.

Sir: In answer to your telegram of the 13th, and at request of Assistant Secretary Hamlin, who had received a similar inquiry, I have just sent you the following dispatch:
Total value exhibits in bond received at Exposition approximate fourteen and a half million dollars.
Withdrawn on payment of duty or for export, about seven hundred thousand.

Withdrawn on payment of duty or for export, about seven hundred thousand.

Leaves on hand about thirteen million eight hundred thousand. This includes Government buildings, eathbits, booths, etc.

It is not probable that more than four, or possibly five millions of these would be sold under any circumstances. Duty on this portion would amount to about $2,000,000.

The figures here given are necessarily approximate, as only a part of the goods have been appraised. Under the regulations the exhibitor is not required to furnish regular or consular invoice, and those that have been furnished have not proven as reliable as the invoices furnished in the course of commercial operations.

It is assumed, however, that the figures given in the telegram are approximately correct.

You are aware that several foreign nations have built buildings for their use in Jackson Park, much of the material for which is imported and is included in the above statement. This material could not well be reexported, and it has practically no selling value here.

Exhibits belonging to foreign governments, of which there are many, and of great value, would not be offered for sale under any circumstances.

Trusting the information will be sufficiently explicit to meet your purposes, and of the members of the Ways and Means Committee, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

HON. W. E. CURTIS, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the goods in bond that are likely to be thrown on the market will not exceed four or five million dollars, which, at the rates of duty now provided by law, would yield to the Government a revenue of about $2,000,000. The bill as first introduced provided for a reduction of the appraised value of the goods one-half; but the committee directed an amendment because of the fact that, in the case of goods on which specific duties are levied, a reduction of the appraised value would give no relief. Therefore, the amendment reported by the committee provides that these goods shall be released upon sale and payment of one-half the rates of duty now provided by law. There has been one objection made to the bill; namely, that a large portion, or at least a considerable portion, of the goods now exhibited have already been sold. While I have not the authority of the committee for it, I propose to offer an amendment to the effect that the provisions of this bill shall not apply to any goods contracted for, bargained, or sold prior to its passage. The purpose of that amendment, of course, will be that the purchasers shall get the benefit of the reduction of duties and that the foreign exhibitors who have already made sales at stipulated prices will not be enabled to pocket the amount of the duties released or remitted. I propose to offer the amendment to obviate that objection. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House. The question is simply whether we ought to grant this concession to the foreign exhibitors.

Mr. DINGLEY. We would like to hear the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. We would like to hear the amendment.
Mr. BYNUM. I have drafted it rather hurriedly and will read it myself instead of sending it to the Clerk, as I can probably read it better than he can:

Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise sold prior to the passage of this resolution: and any purchaser, or exhibitor, their agents or representatives making application for the release of any goods, wares, or merchandise under and by virtue of the provisions hereof shall, before being entitled thereto, and to the remission of the duties herein provided for, make and file with the customs officer of the port an affidavit stating that such goods, wares, or merchandise vere not sold prior to the passage of the same; and any person making a false affidavit as to any facts requisite to the entry of such goods, wares, or merchandise at the reduced rates herein provided for, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and thable to the same punishment as provided by law for making false statements in regard to entries of foreign merchandise.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Suppose an existing contract is rescinded, then what?

Mr. BYNUM. If an existing contract is rescinded, then I suppose the purchaser would not give the same price for the goods, knowing that this reduction of duty ought to reduce the goods come under the operation of this measure?

Mr. BYNUM. I think if there was a resule the purchaser would get the benefit of the reduction.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the question which, in my mind, is a very doubtful one, is whether under the terms of the resolution the resolution of the contract would release those goods from the operation of the contract so as to give them the benefit of this reduction.

of this reduction.

Mr. BYNUM. I think it would so operate if there was a bona fide release and a bona fide contract made afterward.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Would it not be better to make the provision clear, leaving no room for construction?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not see how it can be made clearer than it But I have no objection to any amendment which the gentleman may suggest for the purpose of making the resolution cover more specifically such a case as he mentions.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It seems to me this point is important. The resolution as now drawn provides that the provision shall not apply to any goods whatever which, at the time of the passage of the resolution, have been bargained away, or with reference to which a conditional sale has been made. If the resolution be passed in that form there may arise a very serious ques-tion touching the condition of goods which have been the subject of a bargain, but which bargain is rescinded after the passage of that point Mr. COBB of Alabama. My point is that although there may be a bargain of sale, yet if that bargain is rescinded and the goods are sold to another person, they ought to come under the

Mr. BYNUM. To the same person, I should say.
Mr. COBB of Alabama. That would invite a rescinding of the contract and the turning round and making a new sale.
Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]

will permit me, I would like to say that I was at the Fair recently and on pricing different goods the answer was in every instance, as I now remember, "We will sell these goods for so much plus the duty or we will sell them at so much including the duty." In each instance, the duty if paid by the exhibitor was to be added to the price. I take it that if this bill is passed the purchasers of these articles will get the benefit of the reduction provided.

Mr. ALDERSON. In other words, the consumer pays the

Mr. McMILLIN. That is pretty clearly demonstrated when you price goods at the Fair and see what you can get them for, subject to the duty, and what you can get them for, duty paid.

Mr. BYNUM. I apprehend there is no division of sentiment on the point that purchasers in this country should get the benefit on the point that purchasers in this country should get the benefit of this release of duties; and whatever amendment may be necessary to carry out that object effectually will readily be assented to. I presume, by every member of the committee.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. My impression is that in a matter of this sort nothing should be left for construction.

Mr. BYNUM. It is better in all matters that as little as possible be left for construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is simply whether this concession should be granted. I believe it is a fact that inno other exposition have such concessions been granted either in this or in foreign countries to its citizens.

Mr. DURBOROW. Are you not aware, or is it not a fact, that the same thing was done in connection with the Centennial Exposition in 1876?

Mr. BYNUM. I understood that there was an act passed by Congress at that time, and that this is a copy of such act, but—Mr. DURBOROW. It is identically the same, as I understand it

Mr. BYNUM. But there were no concessions then, as I understand. I had that impression when I prepared this report, but I have since been informed that there was no concession granted to exhibitors in the way of reduction of duties.

Mr. DURBOROW. I have an impression that there was.

Mr. McMILLIN. No; it gave them authority to sell in bond.

Mr. BYNUM. That is my impression.
Mr. DINGLEY. This, then, is the first time that a reduction of duties has been proposed to exhibitors in such cases?
Mr. BYNUM. It is.

Mr. BYNUM. It is.

Now, I do not desire to occupy any further time. I will reserve the remainder of my time to yield it in case anyone shall desire it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to remit one-half of the duties on all of the imported goods which have been placed in the Exposition at Chicago for exhibition. By the letter read from the collector of customs it appears that about $15,000,000 is estimated to be the value of the articles, including the material for some of the buildings, imported for this Exposition by the foreign exhibitors who would be relieved by this bill. Of goods or merchandise I understand the estimated amount is about $12,000,000, or a little in excess of that. It is admitted that the average duty on these goods, if paid, is not less than 50 per cent. I think it is probably more than that. But assume that it is 50 per cent, then if all these goods should be sold there would be remitted $3,000,000 in duties to these persons who are exhibiting them. It is estimated, however, that probably not more than $4,000,000 of the $12,000,000 would be sold—

Mr. BYNUM. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that estimate includes the buildings.

Mr. DINGLEY. The estimate of $15,000,000 includes the buildings; but I understand the goods and merchandise exclusively to be estimated at not less than $12,000,000.

Mr. BYNUM. But the amount to be sold is estimated at not more than four or five millions.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; but assuming all the articles exhibited shall be sold, the remission of duty would be $3,000,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask what figure he places on the probable amount of sales?

Mr. DINGLEY. If all of the goods should be sold the remission of duties would be $3,000,000. It is estimated, however, that the sales will not exceed four millions. That is a matter of judgment. It may not be in excess of that, or it may be very

Mr. DALZELL. I think that is not at all likely. On that point I have a letter which comes from the Treasury Department, in which it is said that an unofficial estimate of a highly intelligent source, of the probable maximum amount of sales under the provisions of this bill, places the total at only about $1,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. That must be a grave error.
Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman must remember that many of these exhibits are works of art and must be returned.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am well aware of that, but the valuation on them is a mere nominal one.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. On, no; they are valued at their

Mr. SPRINGER. So that deducting these articles, which would not be sold, and the immense mass of other matter that can not be sold, I think the estimate is quite a liberal one.

Mr. DINGLEY. But, however that may be, Mr. Chairman, although the remission of duties may not excede $1,000,000, yet the principle is more important than the amount involved.

the principle is more important than the amount involved.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But according to the letter of the Treasury Department it would not exceed probably $500,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, in a matter of this kind I think it important, because it is to be a precedent for the future, that we carefully consider the principle involved. If it is right to remit duties in such cases, certainly we should do it in this case, because of our kindly feelings towards the exhibitors of these foreign governments, who came here to participate in the Fair; but we must bear in mind that if we establish that precedent in this case it is to be followed in all cases hereafter.

I desire first to call the attention of the committee to the fact.

I desire first to call the attention of the committee to the fact that notwithstanding there have been expositions held in almost all of the leading manufacturing and commercial nations of the

and of the leading manufacturing and commercial nations of the world, that in no single instance up to this hour has there been a rebate of duty by any government on any article imported and placed in such expositions, when sold in such country.

Mr. McMilllin. Will the gentleman allow an interruption? I wish to say that in view of the fact that many of these goods are necessarily damaged by the dust and wear and tear of several months of exhibition, and in view of the further fact that large expenditures have been made by these exhibitors in order to make our fair a success, does not the gentleman think that in the abstract, whatever may be the proper policy on the tariff question, we can and should afford to make some little concession ors in Chicago could have been made just as well in behalf of American exhibitors in Paris and in Vienna. Yet it is a fact that at the expositions in both of those great commercial centers whenever an American exhibitor sold an article, he was required to pay the same duty that all other persons paid on that partic-ular article. Hence the principle of remitting duties in favor of exhibitors at a great exposition when the exhibits are sold, is a new one.

It may be said, and said with some force, that these gentlemen are entitled to our favorable consideration, that they have come thousands of miles to place on exhibition at Chicago certain articles, which have suffered somewhat in transportation, but we must bear in mind that they came here just as American citizens went to Europe, to further their own personal interests in trade, and not as a matter of mere benevolence. It is no further and transportation costs no more from Chicago to Paris than it does from Paris to Chicago, and yet, when citizens of Chicago went to Paris in 1878, and subsequently exhibited their goods and sold them in the French market, they were required to pay the same duties as those paid by other persons selling the goods. Hence I say that whatever force there may be in this suggestion, up to this hour no government has thought it worthy of consideration in estimating duties. Duties have been imposed and paid upon all articles placed in every exposition in the world, when those articles have been sold in that foreign market.

Hence I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we are establishing a new principle in this matter, and that we are proposing to do for exhibitors in this country what was never done for American exhibitors in any other country, and what we have never done for foreign exhibitors in this country up to the present time.

My attention was called to this matter before this bill was introduced, and before I knew that any bill was to be introduced. I was in Chicago visiting the Exposition some three weeks ago, and I noticed upon a large number of articles the placard "sold." I inquired of one of the exhibitors, a German, as to how they did this thing.

"Why" he sold "these goods were sold to be delivered at the Why," he said, "these goods were sold to be delivered at the close of the Exposition."

"Were they paid for at the time of the purchase?"
"A few of them were paid for, but mainly they were to be sent by express, with collection on delivery."

Now, it occurred to me when the bill was reported that as to every one of those sales which have been already made, and on which the American purchaser had paid a price supposed to be equal to the value of the goods and the duty, that the only effect of a bill of this kind as to such articles as those would be to put the money in the pocket of the exhibitors. Hence after this bill was reported I called the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this fact; and it appears that an amendment has been introduced to obviate that particular objection. So far the bill has been improved. There is no doubt about that.

I do not desire to do anything more than to state some objection. So far the bill

tions that occur to me. I appreciate the force of a great deal that has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Mc-Millin]; but it does seem to me that to allow these exhibitors, who are one class of importers, who have brought their goods here for purposes which they supposed would benefit themselves, just as all other business is carried on in this world; to allow one class a rebate of half the duty and not allow a rebate of duty as to other persons—Americans—who have imported perhaps precisely the same kind of goods and put them upon the market, paying the whole duty, is hardly just to them. That is what it ems to me.

It seems to me extremely desirable that we should not set an example in a matter of this kind, especially in the present condition of the Treasury, of rebating half the duty on these imported goods, under these circumstances, as a means of aiding these exhibitors. It would be a great deal wiser to appropriate these exhibitors. It would be a great deal wiser to appropriate directly from the Treasury the million of dollars practically indirectly given to them by this bill.

It has been suggested that if this act should pass, so many more of these goods would be sold in this country that the

Jovernment on the whole would reap as much revenue as if this bill should not pass.

Now, that is a mere matter of judgment. There are no attainable statistics which can lead to any such conclusion. My own judgment is that a large portion of these articles, especially those in the fine arts, will be returned generally, because they are paintings of a character that would be retained in the galleries from which they came. If there are many sold here, our duty upon works of art like these is very small. It is only 30 per cent. These works of art are bought by people who can well bear the expense in that direction. I can hardly see the reason for rebating the duty with reference to them. Neither do I think a rebate of one-half the duty would be likely to increase bill should not pass.

the sale of articles of that kind. It would only be 15 per cent, and would not amount to a great deal, especially with the class of persons who would purchase such articles.

But in reference to a large proportion of articles there that are likely to be sold, it will amount to a good deal. Everyone understands that all the textile fabrics on exhibition at Chicago will be sold by the exhibitors, whether this bill passes or not. They never will be returned to Europe. They will be put on the market in competition with our merchants, who, where the goods have been imported, will pay the entire duties, and with our manufacturers, who are making substantially the same class of articles. articles. It does not seem to me that a discrimination of this character as to one class of imports as against another class is hardly defensible under all the circumstances.

I have contented myself, Mr. Chairman, with simply stating some of the objections that seem to me to lie on the surface. I do not intend to do further than this, but leave the matter, of

do not intend to do further than this, but leave the matter, or course, to the judgment of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that the gentleman from In-

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana was going to yield to me.
Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the balance of my time.
Mr. BYNUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.
The CHAIRMAN. How much time?
Mr. BYNUM. As much as the gentleman desires.
Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to differ with my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], in whose judgment, as a general rule, I have the most implicit reliance; but I voted for the favorable report of this joint resolution, by the compile for the favorable report of this joint resolution by the committee, and I propose to vote for its passage in the House, because I believe it to be a measure of justice, and one that can be defended on principle, as applicable to existing circumstances.

Now, this joint resolution proposes to do two things. It proposes to make the formula of the proposes to the proposest of the poses to enable the foreign exhibitor to sell for immediate delivery the goods that he has on exhibition at the Columbian Exposition. Up to this time he has never been able to do that. Such sales as have been made have been made upon the terms that the goods should be delivered after the close of the exhibition. Surely there can be no objection to that part of the resolution, which is only just to the seller and just to the buyer. Many men are prevented from making sales by reason of the fact that the party who makes the purchase desires to have immediate the party who makes the purchase desires to have immediate possession of his goods; and this resolution is certainly just to the extent that it enables a party going to the Exposition to make an immediate purchase and get immediate delivery. This is only extending the same privilege that was extended to the foreign exhibitors at the Exposition in 1876, in Philadelphia. Now, then, with respect to the proposition to reduce the duty upon goods sold by these exhibitors 50 per cent. It seems to me that it is only a pressure of justice, under all the directors.

that it is only a measure of justice, under all the circumstances. It must be borne in mind that these foreign exhibitors are in a certain sense our guests. They came here by our invitation. They came here under great disadvantages. It is very largely by their enterprise and their generous energy that this magnificent exhibition has been made the success it is. They have come from all quarters of the globe, across land and across water, at great expense; and the result has been that they have enabled to exhibit to the world the greatest exhibition known in its

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says that these people came from selfish motives. They came, of course, with the expectation that they would get some return for their enterprise; that they would be enabled to put their goods on sale and realize some remuneration in return for what they had undertaken. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact, with respect to this matter, that these exhibitors have met with unexpected and unforeseen conditions. We all know that the cholscare, for example, has had a great deal to do with deterring visitors to the exhibition.

Many parties, I have no doubt, would have come across the ocean to this exhibition if it had not been for the cholera scare; and we must bear in mind, also, that this exhibition has happened upon a time of unexampled monetary depression, when people did not have the money to spend; so that virtually the disadvantages of the seller were multiplied tenfold beyond any disadvantages of the sener were interpreted tentoit beyond any thing that he could have anticipated, and we must bear in mind that under these adverse conditions these goods that are to be exposed for sale have been on exhibition for months; that they have been covered with dust in many instances, and are what is known as shopworn goods; and, under these circumstances, it seems to me that we ought to make to them this concession.

But there is another matter that has influenced my judgment considerably in connection with this question. The House will recollect that my neighbor here [Gen. GROSVENOR], who is not in his seat to-day, was sent by President Harrison as a special agent of the Treasury Department to act in conjunction with our consuls abroad in inducing foreigners to come here and exhibit their goods. He told me, and he authorized me to say to the House, that he had invariably, when addressing parties abroad expecting to be exhibitors, represented to them that the Treasury Department had authorized him to say that with respect to sales or duties, they would be dealt with in the most generous

Now, while the Treasury Department of course had no authority to make any regulation affecting the law, and while neither the Department nor Gen. GROSVENOR had any authority to bind this Congress, nevertheless the fact being as he stated it and as I believe it was, we ought to bear in mind that these people came here under such circumstances. As a matter of curiosity, I went here under such circumstances. As a matter of curiosity, I went to the Treasury Department the other day and copied out of the report of Gen. GROSVENOR a paragraph to this effect:

Everywhere complaint was made that goods exhibited during the continuance of the Exposition would be found at the end shelf-worn and injured by handling to such an extent as to depreciate their value, and that the duty levied upon the basis of the value of goods when brought to the United States would unjustly affect the seller. If the Department agrees with me in this view of the case, it will be a very easy matter to obviate it by a special regulation, which it seems to me ought to be made, authorizing the reappraisement of the goods at the time they are offered for sale at the close of the Exposition, as the basis of tariff charges.

In all fairness we have no right to collect 100 per cent of duty

In all fairness we have no right to collect 100 per cent of duty upon the value of goods fixed before they were shipped to this country, when as a matter of fact that value has very largely depreciated; and in view of what Gen. GROSVENOR has said, we ought, in my judgment, to do one of two things—either have a reappraisement so that the goods may be levied upon at their actual value now, shelf-worn as they are, or reduce the duty. Now, when you come to take into consideration that all these buildings have to be removed at the close of the Fair, and that the Government, in order to have a reappraisement, would be obliged to furnish storehouses and appraisers, and incur all the expense of reappraisement, it is a question in my mind whether it is not economical for the United States Government, instead of having this reappraisement, to strike off 50 per cent of the

The objections urged by my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to this measure are two: First, he says we are establishing a bad precedent. Mr. Chairman, in order to make this a precedent we must have the same conditions existing in the next case; and the likelihood of any exposition ever being held under the same conditions as this one is very remote. So that, so far as prece-dent is concerned, it seems to me it matters little.

Then the gentleman says that these goods will come into competition with our own. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield not at all, in any way or direction, anything of the principle of protection to our American manufacturers and our American merchants. But it is no element of the principle of protection that duties shall not be reduced, or even remitted altogether, upon goods that do not come into competition with our own, and it seems to me that these goods that are likely to be sold fall within that that these goods that are likely to be sold fall within that class. There are thousands and thousands of trinkets that will be bought not by the rich but by the poor, and by people in moderate circumstances, as souvenirs of the great fair. Then the goods that will be thrown upon the market are for the most part goods of the kind that our people do not import, curiosities in merchandise, and, outside of that, works of art, statuary, paintings, brie-a-brac, articles of virtu.

Things of this class that otherwise would return to the Old Things of this class that otherwise would return to the Oila World will remain with us to beautify our homes and our public galleries. I do not believe that the principle of protection has any application at all to works of art. Works of art, if I recollect aright, were put on the free list of the McKinley bill as it went from the House; but whether they were or not, in my judgment they ought to have been. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, not to further trespass on the time of the House, it seems to me that always man the maintains of generosity to those means who not alone upon the principle of generosity to those people who not alone upon the principle of generosity to those people who have done so much for us, but upon the principle of justice, these duties ought to be remitted; and as I voted for the report of the resolution by the committee, so upon these grounds I propose to vote for it in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that for once I am not able to agree with the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], and I do agree with the remarks just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in support of this bill, and I shall vote for it for the reasons so ably set forth by him. But I arose for an entirely different purpose. The gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to certain causes which had operated to injure this great Exposition, among them the fear of operated to injure this great Exposition, among them the fear of Asiatic cholera, the panic, and the appalling business situation which has been upon the country for months past. Great as may be these causes, to my mind they are not the main cause of the comparatively small attendance in the earlier months of the Ex-

Mr. Chairman, I believe this Exposition the greatest event of the nineteenth century. I would not abate one jot or tittle of the credit due the citizens of Chicago and of the business men of that wonderful metropolis that sits on the shore of Lake of that wonderful metropolis that sits on the shore of Lake Michigan. Words can not describe my admiration for the enterprise, consummate skill, and business ability with which the great enterprise has been managed by these gentlemen. The magnificent architecture, landscape gardening of the grounds, and the buildings alone is worth a journey across oceans and continents to witness. Perhaps the grandest sight of its kind that mortal man ever saw on the face of the earth is the "court of honor" of this great Exposition. As I stood there and looked at the buildings, the peristyle, the lagoon, the lake, the four-of honor" of this great Exposition. As I stood there and lookedat the buildings, the peristyle, the lagoon, the lake, the fountain, the beautiful statuary, and the thousands gathered there from every clime, country, and every land, and of every kindred and tongue, I could only think of the city that John saw in the Isle of Patmos—"A city that had no need of the sun."

Having said so much in praise of the greatest exposition of all history, the truth compels me to say that the failure of the Exposition in its earlier months to receive the patronage to which it was entitled was due in a large measure to the bad faith of the managers with Congress and with the country in the matter of Sunday opening, and not until the directors voted to close the Exposition on the Lord's day, in harmony with the vote of Congress and in harmony with the sentiment of a large majority of the great American people, did the crowd begin to come or the Exposition receive that patronage which the American people desire to accord to it. To be sure a little cheap judge issued an injunction which was understood by the manajudge issued an injunction which was understood by the manaers to forbid them from actually closing the gates to Jackson

Park on the Lord's day.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Exposition was practically closed on Sunday. The Government building was closed, many of the exhibits were covered, some twenty-three State buildings were closed—among them the Massachusetts State building—and I am proud to say that from the first day that building bore this inscription, "This building closed on Sundays, by order of the great and general court of Massachusetts."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Pennsylvania building was

Mr. MORSE. Yes; as my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, the Pennsylvania building was among those closed on that day I repeat, I would not detract one jot or tittle from the credit which is due to the citizens of Chicago for this magnificent ex-hibition; and I am glad to say that a large number of the best people of that city were in sympathy with me in regard to the matter of Sunday closing and in sympathy with the vote of Congress, and I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country to the fact that the American people are a Sabbathkeeping people, and that they will not patronize an exposition which violates the Christian sentiment of the people of this country by a desecration of the Lord's day. This fact and the experience of this Exposition in the matter of Sunday opening experience of this exposition in the matter of Sunday opening will be an object lesson to any future expositions that may hereafter be held. All honor to the citizens of Chicago and to the business men of that great city who have carried to such a successful issue this most gigantic work of its kind of all history. Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I should not claim the attention of the House at this time but for the statement made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], tending in the direction of suggesting the impropriety of the legislation proposed rection of suggesting the impropriety of the legislation proposed by this bill. I think a legislator and a legislative assembly are by this bill. I think a legislator and a legislative assembly are always safe when they can say that within the limits of the Constitution their action is founded on justice.

The most wonderful exhibition that ever was made on this earth is now about drawing to a close. To make it the great success which it has been has called for the wonderful energy of that great city by the lake, the good will and attendance of the greatst people in the world, and the combined exhibits and efforts of all the nations of the earth. All these have combined to make an exhibition which will go down to history as one which up to the present moment has never been surpassed or even equaled as an international exhibition.

The people who have gone to great expense to make their exhibits there must soon withdraw those exhibits and box them up. Many of them have been considerably injured by the wear and tear of exhibition. Unless sold here, they must now be returned to their shelves abroad. Many of the citizens of the United States would gladly purchase these articles; but in the very nature of things purchasers will not pay for articles which are worn the same price they would pay for those which are not worn. The Treasury official who was sent out there to report upon the question has reported to the Treasury Department that there should, in his opinion, be a reappraisement of the goods offered for sale, and that on the basis of this reappraisement there should be a new assessment of duties. v. (I believe it was put in the alternative) that there might be a reduction which would be commensurate with the damage done to the goods. This was made necessary, as is suggested to me by my friend from Indiana [Mr. Bynum], by the fact that there were specific rates imposed upon many of these articles.

many of these trucies.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to understand whether there is any proposition to refund any duties which have been paid.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no proposition to refund one dollar of duties. The Committee on Ways and Means adopted the method suggested here of reducing the duty one-half for the purpose of simplifying collections, so that there could be no complaint as to the method of collection and no injustice done to any purchaser, exhibitor, or seller; and in the next place that there might be a much more rapid transaction of the business by reason of the fact that the present rates of duty are known and every article will pay according to the rates already fixed by statute, divided by one-half.

In consideration of the fact that the work of demolition will go on rapidly, and that if there should be a reassessment of duties there would have to be large storehouses constructed and a large corner of Transport of the induction in the constructed and a large corner of Transport of the induction in the constructed and a large corps of Treasury officials inducted into office or transferred there for the purpose of making these reappraisements, and that it would be very difficult to have a reëxamination of each individual article proposed to be sold, the committee thought that the quickest and surest way out was to provide that one-half of the duty ordinarily assessed on the articles exhibited should be collected if they were sold here instead of being returned to the countries from which they came.

Thus much, Mr. Chairman, as to the motives that have induced the adoption of this method, rather than the other, of arriving at the basis of taxation. One word more as to the justice of this measure, and then I shall be through. No man can go through that Fair and look over the exhibits without coming to the conclusion that enormous expense has been incurred by every citizen of the United States or of a foreign country who has taken part in that exhibition. There has been not only the expense of transporting the goods to Chicago and putting them in place, but also the expense of a corps (in many cases a large eorps) of highly-paid expert officials to take charge of the exhibits and to show them to the greatest advantage.

Now, it seems to me, sir, and it seemed to the Committee on Ways and Means, in view of the fact that many of these goods were damaged, and in view of the further fact that so much expense had been already incurred by the exhibitors to bring the goods to our country, that we might afford to meet them half way and say to them that, having contributed their part to make this one of the greatest expositions the world has ever seen, we will meet them the other half way and let them dispose of these goods to our citizens at a payment of duty a little lower than that ordinarily collected on these matters, and still by no means a low duty. Why, on many woolens it will be still 50 per cent, and on many articles it will go from 50 or 60 or even 75 per cent. It is on some, of course, lower than that, but on many of the articles exhibited there, the rate of duty, while not equal to that now provided by law, will still be a high rate.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is just to do this. I believe that we sacrifice no principle of good government when we do it. I do not believe that the man who looks at the tariff question. tion, from a different standpoint from which I view it, can come to the conclusion that it is sacrificing any principle, or that he will sacrifice any in supporting this measure, when you consider the fact that it is the exposition of these goods from abroad that has made this one of the greatest successes of modern times. But inasmuch as one plea that is always raised for international expositions is that it tends to promote intercourse between the people and to create and foster that sociability and friendliness of intercourse that will result eventually in great good, I think we can with perfect propriety make the little sacrifice proposed here in this bill and allow the remission of one-half of these

If we reduce the duty, as proposed, we may sell a very considerable portion of the goods in the United States and get in a not inconsiderable revenue in these times of stringency in the finances of the United States. But if the duty is collected very many of these goods that would otherwise be sold here will be taken away and we will gain no benefit in the shape of duty at all.

I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer], who wishes to be heard.

Mr. Springer. Mr. Chairman, if there could be any objection raised against the passage of this bill, in my judgment, it would be based on the ground that it does not go far enough. It proposes simply to remit one-half of the duties on goods that have been exhibited by foreign importers at this great Exposi-

We must take into consideration first the fact as to what is the average rate of duty imposed on the goods, in order to determine whether we are doing any injustice to the Government or the people of the country, or to those engaged in manufacturing and producing goods of like quality within our own borders.

On textile fabrics, which are largely exhibited at this Exposition, and which will be most affected by the provisions of this bill, the average rate of duty by the present law is over 90 per

Mr. DINGLEY. You mean on woolens.
Mr. SPRINGER. I mean on all textiles.
Mr. DINGLEY. Not on all textiles, but on woolens.
Mr. SPRINGER. It will be a little over 95 per cent in faction.
Mr. SPRINGER. It will be a little over 95 per cent in faction. On some it would be 150 or 200 per cent. On all linwoolens. On some it would be 150 or 250 per cent. On all linens, for instance, the average is perhaps 60 per cent, on silk about 60, and so on. So that on textile fabrics the average rate of duty, at the half rate provided by this bill, will amount to 30, 40, or even 50 per cent. Quite enough, in my judgment, to be imposed on goods under any circumstances, but particularly so when you reflect on the fact referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and by the gentleman from Tennsylvania [Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin], who has just taken his seat, that these goods have been greatly damaged, and are no longer in condition to be sold at the ordinary price or value; and they are desired in many instances as souvenirs by our people, and will not and do not enter into competition with those engaged in this country in manufacturing like products. It is not only just to do it, but it is even short of justice that we should remit only one-half of the duty.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has referred to be

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has referred to the fact that we are establishing a new precedent in this question, and intimated that it was a bad one. I can not speak as to whether it is new or not, but whether it be new or old it is a good one. If I could have had my way, sir, in the first instance when this Fair was inaugurated, I would have provided in the law that all goods sent from abroad for exhibition should be admitted free of duty in bond, and if they were afterward returned to the foreign country from which they came, the bond should be remitted. That is the law now; but I would have gone fur-ther and provided that if they were sold in this country the necessary proof, to relieve them from duty, would be that they had been on exhibition at the Fair from beginning to end, and under these circumstances I would have admitted them to sale free of duty. Mr. RAY.

I suppose these are mainly articles of luxury, are they not? Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. Such as only rich people would desire or could afford?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all. Has the gentleman visited this

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I am sorry that the gentleman has not been able to do so. If he has any credit left, and I know that he has, he will go to some bank and borrow a hundred dollars and leave for Chicago immediately; for the time will soon be up in which he will be permitted to visit the greatest Exposition of modern times or of any times; and I say in all seriousness, no member of this House should neglect the opportunity which he now has of visiting this cair, if he has not already done so.

I say this in his interest, and not in the interest of the management of the Fair; because notwithstanding the financial embur-rassments to which the gentlemen have referred, this Fair has proved a financial success. More than eighteen millions of people have already passed through the gates and paid the admis-

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman aquestion. The CHAIRMAN.

Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.
Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman approve of the appropriation by the General Government for the Fair at Chicago: Mr. SPRINGER. I did.

Mr. SPKINGER. 1 did.
Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if he was not the person who, in a former Congress, proposed a rider to an appropriation bill, directing that the money appropriated for the Centennial Exposition should be returned to the General Government?
Mr. SPRINGER. I did so. Is that satisfactory?

Now the contlement from Maine [Mr. Diviguey] said this was

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] said this was a had precedent. I take issue with him upon that point. I think it is in had taste for this Government to invite the peoples of other countries to come to our country and make an exhibition of their wares, and at the same time impose a duty upon the recedent they being a mounting in many cases to the relief of the goods they bring, amounting in many cases to the value of the goods in the country from which they were brought. I think this is in bad taste. I would have said to the world "come here and exhibit your best productions without money and without

Instead of doing that we have endeavored to make their coming here a matter of profit to us in our revenues, and have charged people for bringing their goods here, when they brought them here for the purpose of exhibition. I want to say to those gentlemen who are members of this House, and who have not felt kindly disposed toward the Exposition in Chicago, that if they will only visit it before it is too late they will concur in the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin] and of others who have been there, that all the sacrifices we have made and all the appropriations that we have made, and the appropriations that have been made by the various States have been well and profitably expended.

There never has been, in the history of the world, such an expesition, and in my judgment there will not be another opportunity of this kind offered to any people of any country in the next hundred years. We can scarcely conceive the great benefits that are to result to mankind and to posterity from this exposition. From this time forth the people of the whole world engaged in productive enterprises of any kind, will be able to utilize the methods which have been subjected and found to be best. They will be enabled to use that machinery in production which has attained the highest success and perfection. will be able to adopt those methods of production which have been approved, and which are shown by this exposition to be the very best possible. Henceforth there will be no excuse for the people in any country to pursuing ancient or unprofitable methods of production; but they can hereafter adopt and follow all the best methods that are known to mankind.

So that we had on exhibition the very best specimens of the handiwork of the people from all countries, and that exposition therefore has added greatly to the benefits and the comforts of mankind.

Therefore I think, if the precedent is to be established, it ought to be in the direction of reducing the duties and of even remitting them entirely, upon such articles as have been brought here for that purpose, and have in good faith been exposed for

The revenues involved are very small, and in my judgment this measure is itself one of revenue, and that we will not lose any revenue by remitting one-half of these duties; but on the contrary we will increase the revenues of the Government for this reason: If we impose the full amount of this tax, where the duty is high, it will be more than the goods are now worth in this country, and the owners will be compelled to take them out of the country again; but if we allow a lower rate to be imposed by remitting half the amount which was originally assessed, they can be sold in this country so the Government will get the benefit of that amount of revenue, which we would otherwise lose entirely.

Hence I do not concede the point made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that we are losing anything by remitting these duties in these times of financial distress, but I believe that by reducing the duties we will be increasing the sales in this country, and therefore, by reducing the tax, we are indirectly increasing the receiver of the country.

rectly increasing the revenue.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman from Maine desires to occupy any more of his time I would like him to do so; if not I would like to make some arrangement as to the conclusion of general debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this discussion that involves, as I think a principle of our own Government, with a good deal more than ordinary interest. I believe that the position taken by the gentleman from Maine is one that is eminently correct, when we take into consideration the policy of our own Government. I believe that the position taken by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], although he is honest in his position, is incorrect, in view of that policy. I am one of those who have enjoyed this exhibit of national grandent of Chicago: and I am one of those who have enjoyed these who have be an example of these who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of those who have a six or the same and I am one of the same and grandeur at Chicago; and I am one of those who have given it a great deal of attention during the three different visits I have paid to it. I think I know something about the character of the goods on exhibition there by foreign nations

I have noticed, sir, that most of those exhibits are made by frms that are luxuriantly wealthy. They represent the wealth-iest firms of foreign powers. Those firms came here in full view and with full knowledge of the restrictions that we place at our gates. They accepted the situation. When we made ex-hibitions in times past, in foreign countries, we complied with the restrictions of those nations, and we paid our entrance fees like men. There was no exception made in those cases. no reason, sir, although it is urged by the gentleman from Illi-nois [Mr. Springer] that it is in bad taste to charge them duty, why we should violate the fundamental policy of this Govern-

Now, what are those exhibits at Chicago that are affected by this bill? They are goods of a character that will be purchased by the wealthy. They are not goods that will be bought by the average citizens of Iowa and Illinois, and of the country, or the great West, and if they were, such average citizens who visit the Fair would not have an opportunity to buy at this late day. Those goods, if this resolution pass, will be taken in by the shopkeepers and men who will exhibit and offer them for sale as goods that are called "imported," and get prices accordingly. They are such goods as fine rugs, elegant furs, fine high-priced Swiss watches that sell for from $300 to $1,000. That class of swiss wateries that sell for from $300 to $1,000. That class of goods will be readily gathered up if your resolution pass, and the average citizen, who wants ultimately to buy these goods, will have to pay a premium that is equaled by the duty which you seek to take off.

We have, sir, in the State of Illinois a watch factory at Elgin, and in view of the promised reduction and annihilation of duty by the present Administration the wages of that factory have fallen off more than 25 per cent and one-fourth of the employes have been discharged. You propose in this resolution to take off the duty on the Swiss watch, which will put it in actual competition with the output of that Elgin factory, and that will violate the fundamental principle of this Government—that is, the fundamental principle of this Government—that is, the fundamental principle which has existed heretofore. I am opposed to that. I am opposed to violating the principles of my party and of my country in the interests of those who would buy this class of goods and who are not the average citizens of the

Do you find, sir, in that exhibit suits of clothes, boots and shoes, hats and caps, shirts and underwear exhibited by the foreign powers? Will a single ordinary citizen in this country profit by reason of your extension there, sir, of this privilege to those exhibits? No; but the one who wants to buy $300 Swiss watch and the man who wants filagree work, which is always "im-(and made nowhere else except in Vienna and Chicago), that is the very class that will profit if your resolution pass.

us be consistent, gentlemen.

As I said before, the position of the gentleman from Maine is correct. It stands for a principle. That principle should be the policy of this Government, and is not in the special interest of the wealthy class. Not a single visitor to that Fair will, at this late day, get a single article at the price it is supposed to be reduced to by virtue of taking the duty off. Most of the visitors have been there. The day when it shall close comes very soon; but a short time and it will be closed. Who will gather up these articles there now on exhibition? The junk-dalars the short keeps the way who will advertise the property of the start dealers, the shop-keepers, the men who will advertise them as "imported" goods and sell them for enormous profits, claiming that they have paid the duty.

Mr. Chairman, let us be consistent in this; let us not fall into the trap that has been set by the wily gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], although I am sorry to see that one or two of our Iriends have tumbled in, and they go neck and neck with my friends have tumbled in, and they go neck and neck with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE]. Let us not tumble into that trap, gentlemen, but stand for principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am very sorry to disagree with my friend from Iowa as to the question of protection being involved in this case. I do not believe, as he has asserted, that by the adoption of this resolution we are going back upon the principle of protection at all. I think that was fully, fairly, and principle of protection at all. I think that was fully, fairly, and completely explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. The sole and only purpose for the adoption of this resolution is to keep faith with the foreign exhibitors who came here upon the representations made to them by the agents of our Government.

Mr. COUSINS. The Government of the United States never promised that we would change the law for their benefit. The agent of the Government of Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS of lilinois. The agent of the Government of the United States made those representations.

Mr. COUSINS. He had no authority to make them.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Whether he had any authority or not, it is a great deal better for the Government of the United States to carry out the pledges of its representative than it is to have these foreign exhibitors believe that we authorized a person of so little character as the gentleman's doctrine would make our representative appear to be, to act on behalf of our Government in inviting them to come here with their exhibits. The question here is not whether these exhibitors are rich or poor. They have come here at great expense, and it is by their coming here with their exhibits that the Exposition has been coming here with their exhibits that the Exposition has been made the marvelous success which all acknowledge it to be.

As has been explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dalzell], owing to a combination of circumstances not foreseen by these exhibitors or by anyone at the time they made their contracts to come here, the enterprise has been, so far as they are concerned, a failure. The financial depression which has prevailed throughout the country has greatly embarrassed them in making sales of the products which they have brought here. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no danger that the people of this country will have any injury done to them by reason of

of this country will have any injury done to them by reason of the amount of these goods that will be placed upon the market. My friend from Iowa has grown eloquent in speaking of the effect upon the operatives of the Elgin Watch Company if the Swiss watches of which he speaks are sold in our market. The Elgin Watch Company is located in the county in which I live; I am personally acquainted with the managers of that great con-I am personally acquainted with the managers of that great concern, and with hundreds of the operatives who work there, and I am prepared to speak for them when I say that this resolution ought to be adopted. These Swiss watches do not injure the sale of the watches made at the Elgin watch factory or of those made at the great establishment at Waltham in Massachusetts. Another point made by the gentleman from Iowa is that these Swiss watches that he speaks of will be sold at junk-shops. I hardly think so

The articles that are sold there will be sold to parties who desire to keep them for their historical interest, and even if they were not, this is not so much for the benefit of the consumer as it is for the benefit of the persons who have brought these goods

Mr. CAMINETTI. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I wish to say that it is a fact that twenty-five of the nations exhibiting at Chicago have applied for and received space in the California Midwinter Exposition, and that all of these goods referred to will be transported to California at the close of the Exposition at Chicago. At that exposition of ours we expect to have not only the people who visited Chicago, but a great many more, who will be induced to visit California by reason of the mildness of our climate to see what we can do there in mid-winter. So that these goods will have an opportunity to be sold in California and will not have to be sold as the gentleman from

In California and will not have to be sold as the gentleman from Iowa has suggested.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The statement of the gentleman from California furnishes an additional reason, Mr. Chairman, why this resolution should be adopted. Now, the fact that when the expositions were held at Vienna and at Paris no such resolution expositions were held at vienna and at Paris no such resolution as this was adopted by either of the foreign governments in our behalf is no reason why our Government should not keep faith with these foreign exhibitors. The situation is entirely different. America, in making exhibits at Vienna or Paris, was simply showing what a new and comparatively undeveloped country could do in comparison with the old countries with long established industries.

But here the situation is reversed. In that case it was the same as New Mexico, California, or Arizona sending their exhibits to an exposition at New York or Philadelphia. They are always willing to do that even at great expense, because they expect great pecuniary benefit from the exposition which they make of their resources, whereas no corresponding benefits could be expected by New York or Philadelphia from making exhibits at expositions in those new States. So, exhibitors coming from Vienna and Paris to our American exposition could ing from Vienna and Paris to our American exposition could not expect that the pecuniary benefits resulting to them would be anything like those resulting to America making an exhibit in one of the old countries. In conclusion, Mr. Chalrman, I say that no Republican is violating any principle of protection or any of the great principles that have characterized his party by voting in favor of this resolution.

[Here the hammer feel]

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to occupy any further time?

Mr DINGLEY. I shall occupy a few minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that general de-

Mr. BYNUM. Tate be now closed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I wish to say a few words. In view of what has been said I desire to recall and further explain several points which seem to me to have call and further explain several points which seem to me to have an important bearing with respect to the disposition of this bill. First, as I have already said, it is admitted that this is the first time in the history of world's expositions when any government of any country in which such exposition was held has proposed to rebate any portion of the duties upon the goods exhibited from foreign counties where they were sold in such countries. And I desire to call special attention to that, because it is a complete reply to all the suggestions that we are under special obligations to exhibitors who have come here from Europe to exhibit their goods—obligations which they, in holding their expositions, did not suppose they owed to us when we were exhibitors. There certainly never has been a suggestion in any country where an exposition has been held—never before a suggestion as to any exposition in this country—never until regestion as to any exposition in the centry any suggestion as to exhibitors who have presented their goods at the Exposition in Chicago, that there should be, a reduction of the control o duty on their exhibits in case they should be sold here. It is absolutely new; it is a principle which no government has ever special to us under similar circumstances.

Second, it has been suggested that some agent of our Government abroad has promised European exhibitors that if they would bring goods here and exhibit them, there would be a rebate of a part or the whole of the duty in case the goods should be sold in this country. Now, I listened to what it was said Gen. Grosvenor had stated to foreign manufacturers with reference Grosvenor had stated to foreign manufacturers with reference to the treatment they would be accorded here; and there was not in that statement a single suggestion that there would be any rebate of duty on any goods that might be brought to this country. The suggestion was simply that they should be treated liberally; and by "liberally" they must have understood that the liberality which their own governments had exercised in the past toward American exhibits—namely, the according to them all facilities for exhibition, the according to them of all the privileges of holding their goods in bond in the Exposition so that there should be no difficulties respecting them—should be extended to them as they had been to American exhibitors abroad. But there was not a single suggestion made by that agent that there would be any rebate of duty. I doubt whether the idea occurred at that time to either the agent or to any ex-hibitor that there would be done here by this Government at this time what no government on the face of the earth had pre-viously done with respect to any exhibit at any of the world's great expositions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it not true that our duties are very much higher than those of any other government?

Mr. DINGLEY. As to some articles that is true; as to others our duties are less.

Mr. HITT. As to a large part of the schedule, our duties are less than those of France.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, the French duties on a very large number of articles exceed ours. Yet at the Parisian exposition there never was a suggestion by the French Government that a single mill should be abated from any duty as to American exhibits sold at Paris. It was never thought of by any one, because it seemed to the French authorities, as it seems to me, that it is wrong in principle to discriminate in the imposition of duties between one class of importers and another class of importers.

The gentleman from Illinois has spoken of the fact that the average duty on these goods placed on exhibit will exceed 50 per cent. So it will. And he says that that is sufficient duty to impose upon these goods. That is not the question. The question whether we shall give this class of importers a rebate of duty which we give to no other class. We talk sometimes about class legislation. Now, I ask gentlemen of the committee whether there ever was any class legislation proposed in this House that exceeded in that direction this very bill now before us, which proposes that an American in Chicago, in New York, in any city, or in any district, represented by a gentleman on this floor, shall, when he imports a given class of articles, pay twice the duty that the foreign exhibitors are required to pay upon precisely the same articles when sold at Chicago.

It is class legislation, Mr. Chalrman—a discrimination which can not be justified.

can not be justified.

If it be said that these goods have decreased in value on account of being placed on exhibition, what is that but a claim count of being placed on exhibition, what is that but a claim (which I am ready to grant) for a reappraisement according to the value of the goods at the time of sale? If this bill proposed simply that, not a word of objection would be raised by me, because that would be simply treating these importers as we treat all other importers. And I will propose at the proper time an amendment which will apply precisely that principle—which will provide that there shall be a reappraisement of these goods and that the duty imposed shall be upon the value at the time they are sold—just the same as is imposed upon every other class of importers. Thus we shall treat these importers as we treat all others. We shall treat these goods when sold just as if they were imported in that shape. That will be justice.

Now, the suggestion has been made that we are under obligations to these gentlemen who have come from abroad and made tions to these gentlemen who have come from abroad and made these exhibits. Granted. We are under the same obligation to every American who has brought his goods to the Exposition and placed them there on exhibit. All have done it from a consideration of enlightened self-interest. They believed that by placing these goods on exhibition at such a grand center as that, it would tend to increase the sales of them in the future to our people.

That is expected as a result, and it is from that consideration that all of these gentlemen, not from benevolent motives, but, I repeat, from a consideration of enlightened self-interest that they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought the purpose of show-they have brought their exhibits here for the purpose of show-they have brought they have brought the purpose of show-they have brought they have brought the purpose of show-they have brought they have brought they have brought the purpose of show-they have brought they have brought the have been hard they have brought they have brought they have br ing them at the Fair in order to introduce them and advertise them to the people of this country. And now I repeat, sir, that I am convinced there is not a single one of all the exhibitors who ever expected any rebate of duty until it had been suggested to them after they came here.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

Will the gentleman allow me an interruption? How can he make that assertion in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dal-ZELL], who spoke by authority of Gen. GROSVENOR on this very

Mr. DINGLEY. Ah, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who gave the words of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor], did not undertake to say that he told these people that if they brought their goods here for exhibition there should be no duty levied upon them. He simply stated, and that was all he undertook or had the right to state, that they would be treated liberally; and I doubt if at that time there was a thought among any of these people that there was to be a rebate of duty, because there never had been before anything of the kind. The only inducement held out to them was that if they exhibited their goods they should not only be fairly treated but liberally

mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I desire to put a statement right there.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I desire to state to the gentleman from Maine that after this resolution, that is presented to the House by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], had been adopted by the Ways and Means Committee, and the gentleman was authorized to submit it to the House Gen GROWETWIP'S atwas authorized to submit it to the House, Gen. GROSVENOR'S attention was called to it, and he said that he was heartily in favor of it and regarded it as a very desirable measure, expressing at the same time his regret that he would be necessarily absent when it came up for consideration, because he said if he were here he would not only favor it because it was in the line of what he had represented to foreign exhibitors, but on the ground that it had induced many of them to come.

Mr. DINGLEY. "In the line" of what we promised. That Mr. DINGLEY. In the line of what we promised. That is a very accommodating suggestion. It was not the promise we made to them that they should have the duty remitted on their exhibits, but that they should be treated liberally. That was the extent of his promise.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. He said, and I desire with the consent of the gentleman from Maine to make this statement, that he put the construction on his representation to the exhibitors abroad as being in the line of such legislation as this. Now, if it was anything different, he would have suggested it or recommended a modification of the resolution; but he said he favored this resolution for the reason that it was to carry out what vored this resolution for the reason that it was to carry out what had been promised.

Mr. DINGLEY. But, Mr. Chairman, that does not alter the matter at all. The fact stands out unquestionably that Gen. GROSVENOR never undertook to represent abroad that there would be a rebate of duty, whatever he may have thought as to whether it was desirable or not. There was no such representation made abroad, for there was no authority to do so. And I simply add in reply to the observation of the gentleman from Illinois who said that it would be had faith on our part not to relinois, who said that it would be bad faith on our part not to rebate one-half of the duty, that there would be no act of bad faith on the part of the Government in not reducing the duties; that it has treated the exhibitors liberally all the way through, as liberally, and even more so, than any American exhibitor was ever treated abroad.

I notice on my left the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who was secretary of legation at Paris at the time of the Exposition of 1878, and I direct his attention now to the fact, and if it be a fact he will corroborate my statement, that at the Paris Exposition of that year every American exhibitor who sold an article manufactured or produced here was obliged to pay the same duty on that article as the Frenchman who imported it for sale in

Mr. HITT. Precisely the same.
Mr. DINGLEY. So much for that.
Now, it has been said that we would increase our revenues if we pass this bill. That is a matter of opinion largely, and I wish to suggest to the House that the facts seem to prove exactly a different probable conclusion. Let us look a moment and see. Many of the articles on exhibition in Chicago will be returned. turned anyway. There are a number of valuable articles in the fine arts department, and some other departments, that will be returned to the countries from which they came. But a large body of these articles, and all of the textiles-I repeat, all of the textiles-without exception, on exhibition by foreign exhibitors in Chicago will be sold in our market, whether this bill passes or not. There is no doubt of that. In fact, many of them have been already contracted to be sold, or large quantities, as a friend on my left suggests.

Those goods will be sold here, whatever may come to pass.

Now, we must bear in mind that this Exposition is near its close;

and I may say in passing that the effect of this bill will not be in any degree to aid this Exposition, because it is nearly completed.

The effect of the bill will be simply to grant a gratuity to the foreign exhibitors on the ground that they have been exceedingly useful to us. They have been no more so than American exhibitors were to them at Paris and at London. There is always a mutual advantage in such cases, and there is no more call upon us for this exceptional treatment than there was on them to treat us in this exceptional way.

Certainly there can be no complaint if they are treated in precisely the same way that they treated us at their expositions. I have no doubt they were astonished when this suggestion was made to them, that they could get this appropriation of a million of dollars; for I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that this bill will, to all intents and purposes, give to foreign exhibitors at Chicago practically a million of dollars. Now if you had brought in a bill here appropriating from the Treasury a million of dollars, to be paid to these exhibitors on account of the great aid they have been to this exhibition, who would have the great aid they have been to this exhibition, who would have voted for it? And yet gentlemen in this indirect way are going to do precisely the same thing, and it is important that they should clearly understand what they are going to do.

But gentlemen have said there will really be an increase of revenue on account of the passage of this bill. Why, Mr. Chairman, how preposterous that is! What class of articles will be sold here, if this bill passes, that would not have been sold without the passage of this bill? Not the textiles, as I have already said; and if all the textiles that are on exhibition there are sold they themselves will afford a relate of duty amounting to very they themselves will afford a rebate of duty amounting to very nearly the sum that I have suggested. They are to be sold any-nearly the sum that I have suggested. They are to be sold anyway, and the same is true of many other articles.

My belief is that the passage of this bill will not to any material extent—especially now that the Exposition is about to close—increase the sales of these goods in this country. What were to be sold will be sold whether this bill passes or not; and it seems to me-while of course that can not be demonstrated by any one, and one man's opinion is as good as another's in that direction—it seems to me underiable that the effect of the passage of this bill will be to deprive this Government of not far from a million dollars of revenue, which it would otherwise obtain. I do not think there is any justification for our attempting this course, especially when we would not be ready to vote a million of dollars to these exhibitors.

If there is any call for it, do it by direct appropriation, and not in this indirect way, which serves to make a discrimina-tion against Americans who are themselves importers. The proposition is to allow a foreign exhibitor to import a particular article and sell it at Chicago for 50 per cent duty, while an American right alongside of him who imports the same article is obliged to pay 100 per cent duty. Is there any justice in

More than that, these goods that are to be sold in our market, especially the textiles, will unquestionably be sold at auction at the close of the Exposition. They will be sold under these reduced duties when other persons, Americans, are obliged to pay twice the duty on the same articles; they will be brought at once into competition with our own merchants and our own manufacturers; merchants who have paid twice the duty, and manufacturers who have made these goods under our laws.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to prolong this discussion further. I have felt it my duty to state what seemed to me the patent objections to such legislation as this. In doing so I have done my duty, and I leave the rest to the committee and the

Mr. BYNUM. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed, and that the bill be considered by paragraphs. There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by sections, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the entire stock of each exhibitor, consisting of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported by him and now in said buildings, is hereby declared liable for the payment of duties accruing on any portion thereof, in case of removal of such portion from said buildings without the payment of the lawful duties thereon.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I offer the amendment to section 2 which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "building," in line 3 of section 2, the following:
"Or that may hereafter be exhibited in the buildings of the California Midwinter International Exposition, as per act approved September 1, 1893."

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of September we Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of September we passed an act permitting the transfer of goods now in bond in Chicago to San Francisco, Cal., to be exhibited at the California Midwinter Exposition. If we pass this law it may prevent the transfer of such goods in bond to San Francisco. I offer this amendment in order to allow that to be done in case this resolution is adopted.

Mr. BYNUM. I have no objection to that. I have examined the amendment and I think it is perfectly proper.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the penalties prescribed by, and the provisions contained in, section 3082 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed and held to apply in case of any goods, wares, or merchandise now in said buildings, sold, delivered, or removed without the payment of duties, in the same manner as if such goods, wares, or merchandise had been imported contrary to law, and the article or articles so sold, delivered, or removed shall be deemed and held to have been so imported with the knowledge of the parties respectively concerned in such said, delivery, or removal: Provided. That in the assessment of duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise, imported and now on exhibition at the World's Columbian Exposition, as authorized by the act approved April 25, 1899, antitled "An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and soa, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois," the fair market value of such goods, wares, and merchandise, as determined under the provisions of the act approved June 10, 1890, entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," shall be reduced 30 per cent, and the duty paid upon the reduced value when any of the goods, wares, or merchandise entered for consumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the committees

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the committee amendment

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Chairman, an amendment is now mecessary in two places in section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will first submit the amendments offered by the committee.

Mr. BYNUM. Anamendment is made necessary by mistakes in the printing of the bill; and I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment from the report of the committee. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "State of Illinois" in line 19 of section 3, and instead thereof insert the following:

"The rates of duties shall be reduced 50 per cent from the rates now fixed by is w, when any of such goods, wares, or merchandise are entered for consumption, and upon payment of said 50 per cent said goods, wares, and merchandise shall be released from bond in the same manner as if the full rates of duties now provided by law had been paid thereon."

Mr. BYNUM. The corrections as made in the report simply change misprints. The word "release" was printed "reduced," and the word "bond" was printed "bound."

Mr. DINGLEY. These amendments may be considered as adopted.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BYNUM. If my friend will yield, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Aldrich] has an amendment he desires to offer; and he would like to offer it so that it may be pending.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I will insist upon my substitute, and just go on with that. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out all after the word "Illinois" and insert instead thereof the substitute which I offer. which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "Illinois," and insert in lieu thereof, as follows:

"That there shall be a reappraisement of such goods as may be sold or not returned to the countries from which they were imported, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes, and the value ascertained at the time of sale, or the sale of such goods, shall be the invoice value of such goods for the imposition and collection of duties."

Mr. DINGLEY. My proposition is in lieu of remitting the duties, to provide for a reappraisement of the goods at the day of sale or the close of the exhibition, and imposing a duty, in the nature of a duty on the valuation ascertained at the time of the reappraisement

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman propose to have them exppraised with reference to their value at the place from which they were exported?

Mr. D. NGLEY. I wish to have their actual value at the time of the sales taken into account. As it stands, these goods have all been invoiced on their entry in this country at a certain invoice value. Now, the reappraisal is simply to ascertain what the depreciation has been while the goods have been on exhibition and to deduct that tion, and to deduct that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood from the reading of this amendment that the reappraisement is to be made of the value of these goods at the time they were exported from the countries in which they were produced.

Mr. DINGLEY. No.
Mr. SPRINGER. That would be entirely unjust, because that would take into consideration the increased value of the goods by reason of the tariff upon them.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.
Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask that the proposed amendment may again be read. Mr. DINGLEY. If there is any doubt about that, I will modify the substitute.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. That places it at the value at the time of the sale of the goods in this country, which would be very wrong in principle.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will modify my amendment so that it will read, "The appraisement shall be on a basis of their original invoice value, less the depreciation on account of their exhibition.

Mr. BYNUM. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois takes preceded over his amendment, because we have a right to perfect the text of the committee amendment for which he offers a substitute.

Mr. DINGLEY. What I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois is, that this question of the substitute be decided, and then he can offer his amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. But his amendment is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. But this amendment would have to be offered to the committee amendment, and if it should be adopted be could offer his amendment to that.

Mr. BYNUM. But that is not the way the rule prescribes.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment offered by the committee is in order. Will the gentleman from Maine give the Chair his attention? Inasmuch as the substitute has been offered by the gentleman from Maine, will the gentleman kindly indicate the change he desires to offer, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois to offer his amendment. amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to modify the substitute I offered by inserting the words "On the basis of their original invoice value, less the depreciation."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:
"And provided further, That all foreign exhibits at such Fair acquired by contribution, or purchase by the Columbian Museum of Chicago for its own use shall be wholly released from all customs duties.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that he withhold his amendment until the question of the adoption of the substitute is determined. He will lose no right by that.

Mr. SPRINGER (to Mr. DINGLEY). If your amendment is agreed to it will not be amendable, because the House will have adopted it in that form.

Mr. DINGLEY. He can offer it as an amendment to my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to make any remarks on that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish simply to say that the Columbian

Museum of Chicago has been organized solely for scientific and educational purposes and in commemoration of the World's Fair of 1893. Its promoters are the men who have borne the brunt of the labor and the expense of making the collection for the Columbian Exposition, and I think that fact in itself is a guaranty that the institution will be conducted in a proper manner and that this amendment ought to pass. I hope there will be no objection to its from any contraction.

jection to it from any source.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DURBOROW. Is that the amendment of my colleague,

Mr. ALDRICH?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. Mr. DURBOROW. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] for the committee amendment as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I think that before that substitute is voted upon I had better offer the amendment which I propose, as it is to be a part of the same section—really an amendment to the amendment. It is to exclude all goods that have been heretofore sold.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to an amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That the provisions of this joint resolution shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise sold prior to the passage of this resolution; and any purchaser or exhibitor, their agent or representative, making application for the release of any goods, wares, or merchandise, under and by virtue of the provisions hereof, shall, before being entitled thereto, and to the remission of duties herein provided for, take and file with the customs officer of the port an aflidavit stating that such goods, wares, or merchandise were not sold prior to the passage of the same; and any person making a false affidavit as to any fact requisite to the entry of such goods, wares, or merchandise at the reduced rates herein provided for, shall be guilty of a mistemeanor, and lable to the same punishment provided by law for making a false statement in regard to the entry of foreign merchandise.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Let me ask the gentleman why he discriminates between one exhibitor and another? Why is a man who happens to have sold his goods before the passage of this law to pay the full duty while others who sell passage of this law to pay the full duty?

Afterwards have to pay only half duty?

Mr. DURBOROW. Because the sales already made have been made on the basis of the regular duty.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. That does not make any difference. The price will probably be the same.

Mr. DURBOROW. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. "The consumer pays the tax." [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] for the committee's amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "Illinois" and inserting in lieu thereof as follows: There shall be a reappraisement of such goods on the basis of their original value less depreciation, as may be sold or not returned to the countries from which they were imported, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the value so ascertained at the time of sale or on the sale of such goods shall be the invoice value of said goods for the imposition and collection of duties.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment on that substitute. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine that the proposition he has presented by this substitute was considered by the Ways and Means Committee when this subject was originally before it. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the last Administration was called in and his experience invoked to aid the committee in the consideration of this matter, and it was finally determined that the way proposed by the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Bynum] would be an easier and better way, and fully as beneficial to the Government. Under the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, interminable trouble will follow in making the reappraisement. Government officials say that it will be al the reappraisement. Government officials say that it will be almost impossible to do it; but even if it is done successfully, it may result in taking more money from the Government than would be taken by a reduction of 50 per cent, because in the reappraisement of many of the articles there will undoubtedly be a larger reduction than 50 per cent.

Mr. COGSWELL. That is no argument if a principle is included.

volved.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I will break off abruptly in the line of argument I was pursuing to answer my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Cogswell], who says that such considerations as I have been urging ought to have no weight if a principle is involved. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is no great principle involved here. I see no reason why any Republican can not vote for this measure just as well as any Democrat. As has been stated again and again, this resolution has been brought into the House for the purpose of carrying out the good faith of this Government to these exhibitors, and no Republican ought to be so hide bound on this question of protection as to put that principle above the honor of his country.

Mr. COGSWELL. Was anybody authorized to pledge the honor of the Government? Because if that is so, this question does not admit of debate.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I have stated, and the committee should understand, the position taken by Gen. GROSVENOR. As agent of the United States he committed this country to this action, or some similar action. That is my understanding. I believe in view of the representations made by that gentleman, we would be breaking faith with those parties if we should fail to you down the substitute of the days that the substitute of the state of the substitute of the state of the state of the state of the substitute of the state of th we would be breaking lattic with those parties if we should fam to vote down the substitute offered here by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] or refuse to adopt the resolution presented by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] who authorized Gen.

GROSVENOR to make any promise as to what Congress would do

Mr. DINGLEY. He did not make any.
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am not able to state who authorized Gen. GROSVENOR, any further than he felt, as the repthorized Gen. GROSVENOR, any further than he felt, as the representative of this Government to those foreign countries, that he had implied if not express authority. He encountered great trouble in getting those parties abroad interested in bringing their exhibits to Chicago. That city being 1,000 miles inland, exhibitors would be subjected to great trouble and expense. Extra inducements had to be offered to those parties in order to get them in such a frame of mind that they would be willing to incur this expense. And it will not do now, it seems to me, for us to discredit our representative, whether he had express or implied authority, or not.

implied authority, or not.

Mr. COGSWELL. What was the promise? That we would make a rebate of duties?

make a rebate of duties?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. There was not any promise as to reducing duties—only that these parties would be protected, taken care of, liberally treated on this question of import duties at the end of the Exposition. That was the representation made.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Is it not a fact that at the time Gen. GROSVENOR made those statements, which you say were made to other governments, he was aware of the law which had been passed in the Fifty-first Congress in reference to duties on goods brought here for the purpose of exhibition?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Gen. GROSVENOR was not only aware of that, but he states that he discussed the question of these large import duties with those parties abroad. This McKinley bill was a subject of general discussion, not only with Gen. GROSVENOR, but with Mr. Butterworth and others of our American representatives abroad. representatives abroad

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, on the point just suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hopkins] that we are bound in good faith to make this rebate of duty on account of representations of Gen. GROSVENOR, our agent abroad, I simply desire to repeat what I think is well understood, that Gen. GROSVENOR only promised that the Government would deal liberally toward foreigners who should come here and exhibit their goods. He made no suggestion that there would be any rebate of duty, and he was not asked to make any such concession, because, as I have already said, there never had been any such thing done at any exposition.

exposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is a good opportunity (is it not) to "deal liberally" with these parties? Why not do it?

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] chooses to introduce a resolution appropriating $1,000,000 from the Treasury for the purpose of "dealing liberally" with foreign exhibitors—which is what it is indirectly proposed we shall do here—then we will test the question what is "dealing liberally" in a matter of this kind. But this indirect method of meeting the question is what I am objecting to.

in a matter of this kind. But this indirect method of meeting the question is what I am objecting to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. 'As the Government is running behind in its expenditues at the rate of $5,000,000 a month, of course we can afford to be "liberal"!

Mr. DINGLEY. A single word with reference to the matter of reappraisement. In the first place there is no difficulty in having at very small expense a reappraisement of these goods that may be sold; because there are customs officials now at the Exposition; they have the original invoices: they are obliged to Exposition; they have the original invoices; they are obliged to have them for the purpose of collecting duties upon articles that may be sold; and this being so, at the very time they proceed to make an estimate of the amount of duties and collect those duties, they can under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may suggest, reappraise the goods according to the present value.

Present value.

Now as to the suggestion that in the reappraisement there would be 50 per cent reduction, in which case the Government would gain nothing by the appraisement, I have simply to say that I took considerable pains at the Exposition nearly three weeks ago to examine into the condition of the articles on exhibition, and as to a large part of the goods they have not been touched by a human hand since they were placed on exhibition at the beginning of the fair. They are in glass cases, to a large extent, and not even a particle of dust has touched them. They are in precisely the same condition as when they were received, and these amount to more than three-fourths of the goods which have been admitted for that purpose, while as to the great mass. have been admitted for that purpose, while as to the great mass of them the depreciation would not exceed 10 per cent. There is no doubt in my mind that a reappraisement of the goods and a reduction of the value would not at the outside exceed 10 per

A single word further, Mr. Chairman, not to prolong the discussion. It seems to me this principle of reappraisement at the time of the close of the Exposition, and on the sale of the goods, taking into account any depreciation which may have occurred during the progress of the Exposition, is just, and fully meets all the suggestions made to the exhibitors abroad on the part of this Government that it would deal liberally with them. At the same time it makes no discrimination against our own citizens who have imported and are engaged in importing goods of a similar character.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question? Of course it will be very easy to appraise goods on which the duties are ad valorem, but how would you regulate the matter of specific duties?

Mr. DINGLEY. Almost all of these goods bear ad valorem duties.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, the great bulk of them do, and those that bear specific duties, mainly metal goods, are not liable to Well, the great bulk of them do, and those depreciation.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, yes; some of them depreciate largely. But if we concede that your principle will work out all right so far as the ad valorem duties are concerned, how about the goods, I repeat, that bear exclusively specific duties?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not aware of any goods that bear an ex-

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not aware of any goods that bear an ex-clusively specific duty that would be subject to any injury when inclosed in glass cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Maine.

The crossion was taken; and one division there were a vos 21.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 21,

Mr. BARNES. I make the point that no quorum has voted. Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman will not do that. There is a decisive vote against the substitute, and it is unnecessary to prolong the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers. Mr. BARNES and Mr. BYNUM were appointed tellers. Mr. BARNES. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So, no further count being demanded, the substitute was re-

Mr. CAMINETTI. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to come in in section 3, made necessary by reason of the adoption of the first amendment to section 2.

Mr. BYNUM. This does not affect the amendment already adopted; it affects a previous section.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "sold," in line 5, section 3, the words, "or that may hereafter be exhibited in the building of the California Midwinter International Exposition, as per act approved September 1, 1803."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CAMINETTI. There is another amendment, Mr. Chairman, to this same section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "Illinois," in line 19, section 3, the words, "or that may hereafter be exhibited in the buildings of the California Midwinter International Exposition, as per act approved September 1, 1893."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me scarcely worth while to make the suggestion, Mr. Chairman, but are you not opening a pretty wide field when you say all articles that may hereafter be exhibited?

Mr. BYNUM. It only applies to those now in bond as exhibits at Chicago

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not think the amendment is confined exclusively to that class.

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the joint resolution H. Res. 22, had directed him to report the same favorably to the House with amendments.

Mr. BYNUM. I demand the previous question upon the amendments, and the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be a demand for a separate vote upon any amendment, the vote will be taken on all the amendments together.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to have the amendment of gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI] reported again. I would like to have the amendment of the

The amendment was again read.
Mr. BYNUM.. That simply allows exhibits now at Chicago to be transferred to the California Midwinter Exposition, under to be transferred to the California Midwhiter Exposition, under the same conditions.

Mr. DALZELL. It does not say so. That is the point.

Mr. BYNUM. That law has been passed, and the provisions of this bill would probably work a repeal of the law affecting the San Francisco exposition. This is simply to allow that law to operate as to the goods that may transferred.

Mr. DALZELL. Then this amendment does not permit goods that may have taken to California and that may be taken to California and the california and the provisions of this provision.

Mr. DALZELL. Then this amendment does not permit goods that may hereafter be imported, and that may be taken to Callfornia, to come in under 50 per cent of the regular duty?

Mr. CAMINETTI. Oh, no.

Mr. BYNUM. Not at all.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to, The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BYNUM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. Sickles, for five days, on account of important busi-

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering bills on the Union Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents, with Mr.

DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose the point of no quorum had been made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], which amendment the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the pending amendment, as follows:

And the Public Printer is further authorized and directed to furnish a complete set of the Rebellion Records to each Senator and Member of the resent Congress not already by law entitled to receive the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment just read.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division, demanded by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire, there were-ayes 55, noes 50.

So the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I give notice that I shall ask for the yeas and nays in the House on this amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by sections,

read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior shall cause the Official Register to be edited, indexed, and published by the appointment clerk of the Interior Department, on the 1st day of December following the 1st day of July above men

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 377 and 378 strike out the words "appointment clerk" and insert he words "superintendent of documents," The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 88. The Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail all public documents printed by order of Congress; and the name of the Vice-President, Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House shall be written thereon, with the proper designation of the office he holds; and the provisions of this section shall apply to each of the persons named therein until the 1st day of December following the expiration of their respective terms of office.

The Vice-President, members and members-elect of and Delegates and Delegates-elect to Congress shall have the privilege of sending free through the mails, and under their frank, any mail matter to any Government official.

Mr. HAYES. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 88 the following:
"Or to any person, correspondence not exceeding 2 ounces in weight, upon official or departmental business."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the franking privilege formerly existed to an almost unlimited extent, and that by reason of abuses of that privilege it was practically entirely done away with. Since then it has been allowed to send letters to Government officials, but no provision has been made for sending what we get from the Departments to the persons to whom the letters or documents are to be sent, and it is by no whom the letters or documents are to be sent, and it is by no means universal that penalty envelopes are sent for that purpose by the Departments. It seems to me this ought to be made to cover that deficiency, and it is so worded as to guard it against abuses, limiting it to departmental and official business, and also limiting the weight to 2 ounces.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not hear the gentlement from Iowa [Mr. HAYES] and I am quite sure other centlements.

man from Iowa [Mr. HAYES], and I am quite sure other gentlemen are unable to hear what he has said. I will ask the gentleman to repeat the substance of what he has said.

Mr. HAYES. Let the amendment be again read. That will explain itself. The amendment was again read.

Mr. HAYES. I do not care about the question of weight; but I thought that would be small enough.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to strike out "two"

and insert "one."

Mr. HAYES. I accept the amendment. That is entirely satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa to modify his amendment?

Mr. HAYES. I do.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was going to ask the gentleman where it varies from the present law? We now have the right to send letters to the heads of Departments.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but there is no provision made in the law Mr. HAYES. Yes; but there is no provision hade in the law for sending what you get from the Departments to those for whom you make the inquiry; and the return letters are not sent in all instances. They are generally from the Pension Office, but not from the other Departments.

Mr. McMILLIN. But we have a stationery account now. That was given originally in lieu of the franking privilege, as I understand it.

Mr. HAYES. That is very true; but this does not give full franking privilege. It simply gives a very limited amount, so far as weight or bulk is concerned, and refers entirely to de-

mr. McMILLIN. But what I was calling the attention of the gentleman to was that when the franking privilege was abolished the present stationery account was given in lieu of that, as I have been informed, although I have not made an examination of the fact. Mr. HAYES. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. And the stationery account remains still if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HAYES. There is no reason to change that, because this only relates to letters from the Departments; and the franking privilege was for all purposes. I do notknow how true it is: but to illustrate what was said about the franking privilege, I have heard it said a dozen times that members used to send their washing home under the franking privilege. [Laughter.] Perhaps that was really meant as an illustration of the extent to which it was used.

Mr. McMILLIN. Congress cut off the washing, but gave $150 of stationery account. Now, are we to add the washing? [Laughter.] Mr. HAYES. Mr. HAYES. No; it simply applies to letters such as relate to departmental and official business; and it seems to me that Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me.

As I understand, the franking privilege was abolished by Congress because it was very much abused. It had been carried to a ridiculous extreme; then we have gone to the other extreme, and Allowed $150 on stationery account.

Mr. HAYES. I think the gentleman is right in both propositions, and this is just to rectify the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the reading of the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Or to any person, correspondence not exceeding an ounce in weight.

Mr. HAYES. That is as I want it.

Mr. McMILLIN. This would not include a letter addressed to a constituent in connection with that business

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir.
Mr. McMILLIN. It is intended only that when you get a response from a Department to inclose it in an envelope and send it to the party? Mr. HAYES.

Mr. HAYES. That is the way I illustrated it; that it was governmental and official business.

Mr. SIBLEY. Would it preclude me from inclosing a letter in respect to the official and departmental business?

Mr. HAYES. I think it would not, under the ruling that was made in the case of the gentleman from Massachusetts, by the Assistant Attorney-General Mr. McNAGNY. He he

Mr. McNAGNY. He held just the other way. Had the Commissioner of Pensions the right to make that rule?

Mr. HAYES. I am speaking of the ruling of the Assistant Attorney-General, in which he held that he had the right to send that letter

Mr. HERMANN. Is it under that clause of the law that permits members of Congress to avail themselves of this particular

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered the gentleman from Iows

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAYES. Division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 42, noes 40; so

the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I offer the amendment which I send

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to section 90 the following: "And all blanks, blank books, and printed or engraved matter of every kind whatsoever supplied by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, to any of the employés or bureaus under them, or used by them in their Departments, shall be obtained from the lowest responsible bidders for furnishing printed and engraved matter respectively, under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same for a period of four years under such conditions as such Secretaries and the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General may prescribe: Provided, That the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department shall submit respectively estimates of the cost of printing such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the said Departments of the Government, and they shall furnish such printed and engraved matter whenever, upon their estimates of the cost of the expenditure thereof will be less than upon proposals made as above provided for."

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The bill now under consideration, it would seem from the statements made by its friends all along the line of the present discussion, was born of the spirit of economy and reform. The distinguished gentleman [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee], who has it in charge as his particular protégé, has nursed and supported it with laudations of the unprecedented way in which it will reduce the expenditures for Government way in which it will reduce the expenditures for Government printing. The amendment which I propose and which has been just read will see his bluff of $200,000 of proposed saving and go him at least $600,000 better in the grand effort at reform. The act of March 3, 1883, authorized the Postmaster-General to invite competition between the Public Printer and all other printers in doing the work required for the Money-Order Bureau of his Department. That experiment, which was begun in 1884 and has been continued down to this time in the Post-Office Department, this amendment proposes to extend to all the other Executive Departments of the Government.

The experiment of making the Public Printer compete as to departmental work with private printers has been proven to insure a wonderful saving, as was shown in the exhaustive investigation conducted on the subject by the joint committee of the House and Senate a few years ago. In that examination, among numerous witnesses examined, was Postmaster-General Wanamaker, one of the best business men that ever held an executive portfolio in the history of the Government. The committee did not require him to appear and subject his statements to cross-examination, as he would cheerfully have done, but they addressed him written interrogatories on the subject of the expenditures for public printing, and requested his views as to what could be done to promote economy as well as efficiency in that service. He replied in writing, and his testimony will be found in the printed volume containing the proceedings of that investigation, from which the gentleman [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] has quoted so frequently. He states that prior to 1884 the annual cost of printing for the Money-Order Bureau was $62,000, but that under the act of 1883 a perfectly responsible private printer was found who readily took the contractat $48,000, and kept it at that figure until 1891, thus saving the Government on the face of the prices the sum of $98,000.

But he further testifies that this was not the only saving, because during those seven years the money-order offices increased 58 per cent and the postal money orders 35 per cent, while the cost of printing did not correspondingly increase from year to year, as it would have done under the practice of the Public Printer. Making allowance for these increases and the further fact that in this time the postal notes increased from seven million to thirteen million, Mr. Wanamaker testifies that the saying to the Government during the seven years would be fairly stated at $125,000. He then goes on to state that when the letting of the same work came to be made in 1891 he got from the Public Printer a careful estimate as to what he would do it for from 1891 to 1895. The Public Printer replied to this request that the lowest figure at which he could do the work specified was $90,900. The bid of a responsible private printer who took the contract and gave a perfectly good bond, and has since done the work with entire acceptability to the Department, was $45,800. The bid of the Public Printer was therefore just 100 per cent above that at which the Government was able to have the printing done under the act of 1883. There has, therefore, been in the last four years under which this law has been in execution a further saving to the Government of at least $180,000. eleven years the Government will have saved in one single bureau under this law the sum of $305,000. Why should not this salutary and effective law, which has worked thus well in one bureau, not be extended to all the others in the Executive Departments of the Government? It has been demonstrated as clearly as human experience can do so that a saving of 50 per cent has been made in one Department with entire safety and convenience to the public service. Why shall not the same saving be enlarged by widening the operations of the law? The appropriation for departmental printing for the present fiscal year is $1,423,500. Why shall not the effort be made by an extension of the act of 1883 to save 50 per cent of this vast sum, which will amount to $711,750? What do all the petty economies promised, and only promised, by the present bill amount to when compared to this vast aggregate of almost three-quarters of a million

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. With pleasure. But I shall have to have my time extended if I am to reply.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the House to extend it for you. You seem to know a good deal about this business, and I would like to ask you, or the chairman, or some one who knows, how it happens that it costs more to get work done at the Government. You seem to know a good deal about this business, and ernment Printing Office than it does at any other printing office on earth?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. If the House will give me the time I shall be glad to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes longer.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Before you start I want to give you one fact. I bought a well-bound copy of the Koran for 3 cents, brand new out of the publishing house, and you can buy books large as the reports of the Department of Agriculture from John B. Alden & Co., or from Funk & Wagnells, bound and printed just as well as they are bound and printed at the Government Printing Office, for from 25 to 50 cents a volume.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The reason that printing costs so much at the Government Printing Office is because of the extravagant and unbusinesslike methods of that office. They employ too many useless hands, they pay too high prices for their stock, they squander too much money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How are you going to stop them?
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. By the amendment I propose, to some extent at least. The appropriation bills provide—I take it from the report of the gentleman from Tennessee—33,674,759.50 for printing for the year 1891. Of this sum $1,973,784.50 is for printing for Congress and $1,346,000 for the Executive Departments.

For the year 1893 the total appropriation is $3,543,784.00 for the For the year 1893 the total appropriation is $3,543,764. Of that sum $1,423,500 was for the printing of these Executive Departments, and $1,547,164 for the printing for Congress. If you will examine the figures you will find that while the printing for Congress has been cut down half a million dollars on the last appropriation bill, the printing for the Executive Departments has been increased almost $100,000. This amendment of mine applies exclusively to the Executive Departments. If you will allow these Cabinet officers—the Secretary of State and all the other Secretaries and the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General—to bring about this competition, you will save thoreby 50 per cent of that $1,423,500, or $711,750.

I make my statements on the authority of the late Postmaster-General—Mr. Wanamaker—whose testimony on this subject has never been controverted. Notwithstanding all the witnesses that the gentleman from Tennessee called, and notwithstanding all that he knows about the matter, no man has ever pretended that the statement of Postmaster-General Wanamaker is not the fact.

the fact.

Why should there be a difference of 100 per cent between the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office and the cost at the best private printing establishments of the United States? That question can only be answered as I have answered it—be-cause, as I believe upon investigation, the methods of the Government Printing Office are extravagant beyond measure.

employés are too numerous; they are not put on for the purposa of working, although I do not want to say that in any offer

Mr. McKAIG. Who puts them on?

Mr. MCKAIG. Who puts them on?
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The Government Printer.
Mr. McKAIG. Do not Congressmen put them on?
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The gentleman perhaps knows whether

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The goal and you that is the fact. I have not put any on.

Mr. McKAIG. You keep the Congressmen away, and you would not have the place filled up as it is.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. That may be one reason why gentle. men ought not to interfere with that establishment. I have not done so. I have not spoken to the Public Printerfor years. But no matter how these employes get there, Con-s ought to devise a method by which the present condition two years. of things shall not exist. Gentlemen talk about economy; and they undertake to cut off a few Agricultural Reports, a few ethnological reports, or a few copies of the Rebellion Record, cost ing altogether less than $100,000. Here is a plain way by which we can save three-quarters of a million dollars.

I have been connected, to a greater or less extent, with a printing office for twenty years, and I can not but remark that it is unfortunate that there is not a practical printer on this committee in the House, nor is there one on the Senate committee. While the members of these committees are elegant gentlemen. they do not seem to understand the question of printing.

The gentleman from Tennessee will remember that during the last Congress I called his attention to the fact that the Cox-GRESSIONAL RECORD was printed on paper absolutely unfit for I said it was damaged paper the moment I saw it. the purpose. How it got into the paper wareroom, or how it passed through the hands of the superintendent, I do not know. But it got there; and I believe it got there by bad business methods in some way—perhaps without criminality or neglectful fault of anybody, but it got there.

Now, I do not want to prolong this debate, but simply to test this question. Mr. Wanamaker has further testified that the printing done by private parties was done more promptly and if anything better than that done at the Government Printing Office. He also stated that it could be done in this way without notice; that he could have the work done at any time that he ordered it, whereas, as he says, the Government Printing Office is so constituted that he could never get printing of any kind done for his Department without sixty days' notice. Here we have a bureau of this Government spending $3,600,000 a year, or more than it costs to run one of the great Executive Departments of the Government. The Agricultural Department does not cost much if any more than $3,000,000 for all its annual expenditures. I think that as a mere question of economy, based on undisputed testimony, this amendment ought to be adopted. Let us have the question tested whether this enormous saving of three-quarters of a million dollars can not be made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRETZ. If I can be recognized I will yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not yield his time; but if there be no objection the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be extended for five minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will be allowed five minutes longer.

There was no objection. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I do not know that I care for more than a minute. As will be seen, my amendment proposes that these different heads of Departments shall ask the Government Printer for his estimate of the matter required to be printed by the Department; and the Public Printer is to give the very lowest cash figure at which he can do the work. Then the head of the Department is to obtain from some good responsible private printer a statement of the price at which he will do the work. Unless the private printer will do the work for less he is not to have it; it will go to the Government Printer.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me one question on that point?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. With pleasure.

Mr. SAYERS. As I understand, the gentleman proposes, in this amendment, that whenever one of the heads of Departments desires any printing to be done he shall first go to the Public Printer for his estimate?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. No; that he shall make his own statement of the amount of public printing—blanks or other printing which may be required—and send it to the Government Printer. Mr. SAYERS. And then goes to the Public Printer for an estimate as to the cost of the printing?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Certainly.
Mr. SAYERS. Now, if after demand it is found that a private contractor can do the work better and at less cost to the The Government, your proposition is to let this printing to the private contractor. The question I desire to ask, then, is this: How do you propose to maintain the printing establishment? You will readily see, if your amendment is adopted, that it will necessarily dispense with the force at the Government Printing

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not wish to make a speech. I will get you the time if you want more. But the committee should thoroughly understand this matter.

You will see, if your proposition is adopted, that a large pro-

You will see, if your proposition is adopted, that a large proportion of the Government printing will go to private contractors. In that event what is to become of the present force in the Printing Office? Suppose you have a certain amount of printing to do, and the private contractors can not do it? Will you keep a large force of men in reserve? Will not there be a danger that you will be compelled to maintain a large force at the Printing office in any event, notwithstanding the fact that a large proportion of the printing may be done by private parties? I would like the gentleman to take into consideration that question, and explain how his amendment would affect it.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The Government Printing Office did 81.973,000 worth of printing in the last Congress for Congress alone. In the present Congress it is estimated that $1,500,000 worth of printing will be done. This amendment of mine perworth of printing will be done. This amendment of mine permits all of that printing to remain with the Public Printer, and will supply a nucleus around which he can build up the force he needs for additional printing to meet emergencies. There is no necessity for the Government Printer at any time to keep a superfluous force on hand or to keep too many men around the office. Under my proposed amendment these contracts are all to be made only every four years, so that the Public Printer will not meet the contingency which the gentleman from Texas suggests more than once during each Administration. He can do then as he has always done heretofore, discharge those he does not want, and when he needs them again with a new Administration will find applicants for work, wastin hereof his power to tion he will find applicants for work vastly beyond his power to employ.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Yes.
Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Does not the Government pay higher wages to its printers than private contractors pay?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I have heard that statement be-

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Now, if it does that, how can the Government compete with private contractors in the matter of bidding for this work?

Mr. DINGLEY. And in view of the fact that the Government

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will we not be obliged to discharge all of the hands, and hawk the Government printing around to anybody who will take it?

anybody who will take it?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Why, I do not intend to intefere with the almost $2,000,000 of Congressional printing, I only propose to regulate the departmental printing. If the Government is paying too much, or paying more than it needs to pay, to employ the very best printers in the country, then we ought not to do it. It is not fair; and that is a question that should be taken into consideration before any appropriations are made for such

Mr. McKAIG. Will the gentleman allow a question in that connection?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. In a moment. If the Government is paying more than they can get good hands for—and I know they are flocking here by the thousands, making applications, and are flocking here by the thousands, making applications, and unable to get work, the best printers in Pennsylvania and elsewhere—why should we not put it in the hands of private contractors to bid for this work, and in that way allow fair and honest competition? If the private contractors get this work, they will find competent and willing hands who are satisfied to work for less, if we are paying too much. Why not leave the question to the law of supply and demand, establishing a fair, honest competition? Why not? And if the Government can get its men at a less rate, not a starvation rate, but a fair living rate—and let me say that the printers' unions all over this country desired. and let me say that the printers' unions all over this country demand everywhere reasonable and fair rates now—why should it not have the right to do so? These men all ought to have reasonable and fair compensation. But there are hundreds of poor printers in the country, worthy and deserving men, who get

Now, it has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DING-LEY] that the Government printers work but eight hours aday. To that I reply that if the difference between a ten-hour law and an eight-hour law, which is just one-fifth of the time, or 20 per cent, between the price the Government charges and the price a private competitor charges, I say if that was all the difference there would be little ground of complaint. I certainly would find no fault, for I never complain where the money goes to the people who do the work, but instead of that we find a difference of 100 per cent between the price of the work done by the Government Printing Office and that done by private parties. The eight-hour law only accounts for one-fifth of this. Who gets the four-fifths?

When you find, then, that the Government Printer says, over his own signature, that he can not do the work for less than 100 per cent above what is charged by a good private contractor, and complains of the law as it exists, fixing eight hours a day as the reason, I say that that is not a justification for the difference. That law would make but one-lifth difference. If there was a reasonable difference we could very well understand why it should exist under these circumstances; but where it amounts to 100 per cent difference, then it is time that we should begin to be economists.

I want to make this change in the interest of economy at a time when we are threatened with a deficit in the public Tres ury, when hard times are prevailing in the country; and I think that this side of the House, which is pledged to the people of this country to practice economy, ought to see to it that these three-quarters of a million dollars annually is saved to them. If we are to be governed by our purpose to prevent class legislation and paternalism in the Government I beg you not to argue in favor of a proposition here such as this bill embodies, which entails such an unneces ils such an unnecessary expense upon our people. Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Why do you limit your amendment to departmental printing, and not extend it to all?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. There are two reasons. One is, as my friend says, the law fixes the Congressional printing, and you can never make an estimate of what we want in that direction we have ordered printing to-day that we did not know we would have occasion for yesterday. We may order some to-morrow that we do not know of to-day; but if I could make my amendment apply, I will warrant you that, with a careful examination and study of this law, I would make it apply.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. You could amend the law, could you not?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. No, it is difficult to amend the law so Mr. BELIZHOOVER. No, it is difficult to amend the law so that you can make a general rule apply; but a Department like the Post-Office or Treasury Department can estimate the vast preponderance of its work on the 1st day of April in one year just as well as on the 1st of April in the following year. Mr. McDEARMON. If this amendment is adopted, is there any assurance that any of the employes now in the Public Printing Office will be discharged, and that the Government will save anything by this amendment?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I have only the assurance that if the Public Printer has only half as much work to do, he will not employ twice as many hands as are necessary. There is an honest man there now, I hope and believe; and I am sure, if a Demo-crat is appointed to succeed him, Mr. Cleveland will appoint an honest man; and when he finds he has no work to do, he will cut down his force, as they always do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of justice in the criticism which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] has made in respect to extravagance in governmental printing.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, I want to ask the gentleman just one question. Is not the larger portion of that extravagance, which the gentleman says is justly chargeable against the Printing Office, to be attributed to Congress and the legislation of Congress, and does not the gentleman know that that is the cause of it?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I want to answer that.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think that is true, that a good deal of it is due to Congress and to our own extravagance; but in the very nature of things, when you consider the organibut in the very nature of things, when you consider the organization of the Government Printing Office, you must see that the Public Printer can not compete with a private individual or the owner of a private printing office on every little job that is submitted. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beltz-Hoover] seeks to create the impression that the committee called Mr. Wanamaker before them and took his deposition, or submitted him to an examination. That is not so.

Mr. Beltzhoover. I did not say that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentlemen certainly gave that impression.

gave that impression

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, certainly

Mr. SAYERS. I only want to say, with the indulgence of the gentleman, that if Mr. Wanamaker's estimates as to the public printing are no more reliable than his estimates as to the profits that the Government would make out of the Columbian postage stamps, I would not rely with confidence upon his statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of truth in that also; but I am not going to criticise Mr. Wanamaker, further than to say this: Mr. Wanamaker is a Mr. Wanamaker, further than to say this: Mr. Wanamaker is a business man, and I have no doubt he desired to make a favor-able showing upon the matters that came under his administration as Postmaster-General. He was not submitted to an examination; and gentlemen who are lawyers, and those who are not lawyers, can realize that there is a very great difference be-tween the mere ex parte statement of a man, and the facts as they will appear when he is submitted to examination and crossexamination upon the facts and figures. My friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beltzhoover] seeks to create the impression that he knows all about printing because he is a printer, and he reflects upon the committee, and charges us with

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). Because he says none of us are printers. Now, I read in the Congressional Directory that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] is a lawyer; that when he was about 21 years of age he got a license and went to practicing law, and he says he has been practicing ever since. Now, I can not see why he would know much more about the practical work of a printing office than other lawyers who are upon this committee and who have given six years of public life to the investigation of these questions.

But I do not care about that. As to Mr. Wanamaker, I simply wish to say that he was not called before the committee and examined in the ordinary method in which witnesses are usually examined, but he sent to the committee a letter, in reponse to a letter which was addressed to him. In that letter he did state something about the saving to the Post-Office Department on this matter of the printing and binding of these documents, such s are covered by these amendments, under his administration. He says that in seven years under that system there had been saved $125,000, or about $16,000 or $17,000 per year.

Mr. TURPIN. I have just come into the Chamber and do not know what has been said, but I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that the Postal Guide is filled up with advertisements? I have a faint recollection of looking over those advertisements, and most of them are well-boring machines manufactured by some firm in Pennsylvania. If advertisements manufactured by some firm in Pennsylvania. If advertisements are to go into these publications why not let all go in alike, and all have an opportunity to advertise in them?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would be willing that the gentleman should have time to express himself upon that subject, but, if you will take the Postal Guide, and were to follow that policy that is pursued in it, I do not think it ought to cost the Government a cent. I say, if that is to be the policy, it ought to cost nothing. If we are going to make our publications on one page of a document and on the other side insert an advertisement of patent medicines, or Cheap John goods, it seems to tisement of patent medicines, or Cheap John goods, it seems to me that we could get all the Government publications for nothing; but I do not want to get into that issue.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the gentleman departs from that subject, I desire to ask, for information simply, is there any law which authorizes the publication of advertisements of private firms in a Government publication that is to be franked all over the country? If there is any law that authorizes it, that law ought to be repealed right now.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no such law, and never has been; but the Postal Guide is full of advertisements, as the gentleman from Alabama has suggested. The Postmaster-General (Mr. Wanamaker) in that letter does say if you will give him the power and the authority to make these contracts for the printing of these blank books and so on of the Post-Office Department, that he can save a vast amount of money. That is prophecy. I believe there might be some saving in that way, and for the reason that the Government Printing Office is not or ganized in order that Congress may get its printing more cheaply than it might have it done by private contract.

Mr. Chairman, it may not be improper to state that many, many years ago Congress started out on this idea of farming out the publications and printing of Congress to private individuals. They soon found that they were swamped in the matter. I have before me in this publication to which I have alluded the whole history of that matter; and if you will refer to it you will find the history of the methods by which Congress originally let out to private individuals and private concerns all the printing of the Government; but they abandoned it and determined it was best to organize a printing office. Now, I am not responsi-ble for that. I found it there, and I have attempted to do the best I could to regulate it and reduce the cost of Government

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended as long as he wants.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was going on to say that there are reasons why it is necessary to keep up the Government Printing Office. The gentleman from Texas struck the point exactly when he spoke of the way we increase the Government printing. I do not see any reason why you should not let out all the printing to private parties if you are to should not let out all the printing to private parties if you are to let out this printing for the Departments. Why not take the Congressional printing and authorize the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate to let it out to private individuals, just as we did many years ago, and as this report shows we did with respect to all publications and printing.

Why stop at one of the Departments? Why do you want to put in charge of each head of the Executive Departments, of each publications that is, to be done for the independent bureau, the printing that is to be done for that Department. You would have to give to the Superintendent of the Fish Commission, to the Chief of the Smithsonian Instituthe Fish Commission, to the Chief of the Smithsonian Institution, and every chief of every other bureau of the Government authority to make contracts for the printing for his own little bureau or department. Where would it stop?

Mr. McMILLIN. Right there, will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it will be conceded that the printing by the Departments has overleaped all proper bounds?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has; and that is what

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has; and that is what we are trying to remedy; we are trying to stop it in this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is utterly appalling. Is there no means by which we can cut it down?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This bill puts a limitation upon departmental printing.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understood that the gentleman in his opening statement said that this bill would save two or three hundred thousand dollars

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; over that. Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think there is a member here and I do not say this in criticism of the committee, because I know their work has been very painstaking and laborious; but there is not a member within sound of my voice who will not concede that we might cut the printing down a million dollars without detriment to the public service. The idea of spending three and a half million dollars for public printing!

Mr. REED. We could save a great deal by ceasing to print the Congressional Record.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I must inwould say that you can not reduce it a million dollars unless you change the laws. The printing of this Government will be largely reduced in this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not want what I have said to be considered as reflecting on the work of the committee, nor on the efficiency of the Public Printer, for so far as I have been able to see he is a painstaking and laborious man; but there ought to be some means by which we can greatly reduce the cost of publie printing

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not yield further to my colleague. He says that he does not reflect on the committee. Why, Mr. Chairman, no man of intelligence could reflect on the Committee on Printing. I have said—and I want to emphasize it here and now, and I beg gentlemen of the committee to listen—the Committee on Printing in the Senate and in the House do not report on resolutions to print exceeding $250,000 of the $3,600,000 spent for printing.

Now gentlemen may reflect on the committee—
Mr. McMILLIN (interposing). I do not want my friend to misunderstand me. My statement was that in making the assertion that I thought there might be so large a cut made in the public printing without detriment to the public service I did not mean to criticise the Committee on Printing for not reporting it in this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And I mean to say that the gentleman could not justly reflect on the Committee on Printing for the great expenditure of printing, because we report only about $250,000 worth of the $3,600,000 that is expended, so that even if we did not report a dollar's worth of printing, if we refused to report a single one of the resolutions introduced here. still you would save only $250,000 a year and you would spend $3,350,000 for printing.

Mr. TURNER. I have understood the gentleman to say that his committee had reported certain reforms in the methods of ordering printing to be done for the Departments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have.

Mr. TURNER. But has not the Committee of the Whole taken the matter out of the hands of your committee and put the old provisions back?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all. The Committee of the Whole have not touched in the least degree the provisions of this bill which relate to the reforms in the departmental printing. The propositions which have been added to the bill in the Committee of the Whole are simply to print some translent publications which otherwise would probably be added to appropriation bills or be provided for by separate resolutions. Putting them in this bill simply obviates the necessity of bringing them up in the shape of concurrent resolutions or amendments to appropriation bills. The amendments put on by the Committee of the Whole, I repeat, do not apply to the reforms in methods and the economies presented in this bill.

Mr. TURNER. Adding together 100,000 additional Agricultural Reports provided for, the increased number of Congressional Records, the increased number of volumes of the records of the late war, will the gentleman tell us how much they

ords of the late war, will the gentleman tell us how much they will make Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will. But the gentle-man must first eliminate the 100,000 Agricultural Reports, be-cause that is not an increase. That simply makes the number Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. the same that was printed last year, and therefore it is not an increase this year.

Mr. TURNER. But it is an increase upon the number recommended in the gentleman's report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; it is not. My report Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; it is not. My report was based upon the number printed last year, which was 500,000

Mr. TURNER. I had supposed from what the gentleman stated that he proposed to reduce that number.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did; and it would have been a further saving of $60,000, and I stated to my friend that I was willing to divide that in two, and use it for an increase of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, but I did not say that that was to be included in the estimate I had made of the saving provided for in this bill.

Now, in response to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER], I believe that if we could get some competent man in any special case to go to the private printers of competent man in any special case to go to the private printers of the country with any particular piece of work, he could probably get it done by them cheaper than the Government Printer will do it. Why? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has stated the reason. We maintain that office; we work the men only eight hours a day; we are not allowed by law to work them exceeding that. Not only so, but we give them a month's leave of absence in every year with full pay, and, in addition, we give them every public holiday during the year with pay, and also other holidays on special occasions. So it must not be understood that the Public Printer can in every little contract compete with private printers. It is not so intended. But if you are going to maintain the Government Printing Office, you must give it the printing, and throw around it such regulations as Congress may had necessary to prescribe from time to time.

Mr. KYLE. Does this bill provide for aggregating the printing of the various Departments under the supervision of the Public Printer?

Public Printer?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This bill is intended to regulate the departmental printing, to prevent the abuses which my colleague from Tennessee and the gentleman from Mississippi have called attention to. It limits the discretion of Cabinet officers and bureau officers to expend the money set apart in the average appropriation, bills for printing.

the annual appropriation bills for printing.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask the gentleman a question, and let me take the Treasury Department to illustrate it. How will the gentleman be able to prevent the excessive expenditure of the appropriation within a given time? For instance, suppose $200,000 or $250,000 is appropriated for printing for the use of the Treasury Department during the year, only one-half of which can be expended during the first half of the fiscal year? Now the Treasury Department, we will suppose, consumes more than its share of the allotment. How will the gentleman prevent the Department from exceeding its appropriation?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas asks me a question which he himself is an competent to answer as I am, because he has been on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. I want to say to the gentleman that if he is no better able to answer the question than I am, it can not be answered, because we have not yet been able to prevent that kind of thing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will show the gentleman how it would be impossible under this bill for the Secretary of the Treasury to expend more than the amount allowed by Congress, unless he violates the plain written law. If the gentleman the contract of the contrac man still asks me whether we can prevent a Department officer from violating the law, I simply answer you may provide by law that a man shall not kill another; but you can not prevent his that a man shall not kill another; but you can not prevent his doing so if he chooses to violate the law.

Mr. SAYERS. My understanding of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is that we shall be able, through the instrumentality of this bill, if passed, to prevent deficiencies occurring for printing of documents required by the different Executive Departments of the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir. Not only that, but I ask the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the provision which I am about to read; and I ask also the attention of vision which I am about to read: and I ask also the attention of the gentleman from Georgia, because it bears upon a question which he addressed to me the other day. This provision of the bill is new; and if it becomes law it places upon Cabinet officers such limitation as will prevent them, I believe, from spending money extravagantly in the printing of documents. The language of the provision is this:

No report, publication, or document shall be printed in excess of the number of 1,000 of each in any one fiscal year—

This is departmental printing-

without authorization therefor by Congress, except that of the annual report of the head of the Department, without appendices, there may be printed in any one fiscal year not to exceed 5,000 copies, bound in pamphlet form; and of the reports of chiefs of bureaus, without appendices, there may be printed in any one fiscal year not to exceed 2,500 copies, bound in pamphlet

Now, without such a provision, one of the heads of the Departments may go to work and print 40,000 copies of a given book, and in three months afterward may print 40,000 copies more of the same book. He may have these volumes elegantly bound, paying for them out of the money set apart by the Committee on Appropriations annually for the printing of that Department. That is what has been done. Some gentlemen may say it was wisely done. But at the last session of Congress the Senate and House, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Printing, passed a bill containing this provision embracing this limitation upon departmental officers. There should be such a limitation upon them.

Why, sir, I have seen a time when the introduction in this House of a resolution to expend $1,000 for printing would bring dozens of gentlemen to their feet to protest against the extravagance of the Printing Committee. Yet under the law as you now have it you put half a million dollars, or $300,000, in the hands of a bureau officer or a Cabinet officer of this Government and allow him to expend the whole of it—that is, you give him the discretion to do so—in the printing of a single book. That is the law now. This bill seeks to establish a restraint in that matter: to prevent money being used in this way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to close the debate on his amendment?

vania wish to close the debate on his amendment?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. That was my idea.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to occupy the floor a few minutes before the debate closes.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Of course I have no objection to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before gentlemen proceed with further debate, I would like to raise the question whether there is to be a session this evening. If not, the committee ought to rise, that the House may dispense with the evening session.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I will give way for that purpose.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise, in order that the question of an evening session may be settled by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dockery reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2650) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 21, 1893.

[Continuation of legislative proceedings of Tuesday, October 17, 1893.]

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m., at the expiration of the

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair tays before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives for reference. The bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government, to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department, was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill probably ought to go to the Committee on Railroads, as it does not seem to apply to Indian reservations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill came from the Committee on Public Lands in the other House.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Committee on Public Lands have not been in the practice of taking charge of railroad bills. We have a Committee on Railroads and a Committee on Interstate Commerce, and one of those committees generally takes charge of such bills, unless the act proposes to interfere with Indian reservations. I see the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Walthall] is on his feet, and he may have some suggestion to make.

Mr. WALTHALL. It occurs to me that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, but in the absence of the chairman of the committee I ask that it lie on the table for the

The bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Apprepria-

The joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Higgins, Hill, Hunton, Irby,

Washburn, Wolcott.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] is abent. He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockcont.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is no quorum present, the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DOLPH entered the Chamber and answered to his name. Mr. HARRIS. In this condition of affairs there is but one of two things to be done, to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators or to adjourn. Those are the only two motions in order, and I select the former, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. STOCKBRIDGE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute

the order of the Senate.

After a little delay, Mr. McMillan, Mr. Davis, Mr. Ran30M, Mr. Mills, Mr. Manderson, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Coke, and Mr. BUTLER entered the Chamber and answered to their

Mr. HARRIS. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered. Mr. BERRY. There was a bill which came over from the House of Representatives requiring railroads to arect depots within a quarter of a mile of town sites in Territories where they are operating over land grants made by the Government of the United States. There is some question whether the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands or the Commit-tee on Railroads. I have no particular desire to obtain jurisdiction of any larger number of bills for the Committee on Public Lands than we have, unless the bill should properly belong there. I am not sure in my own mind whether the bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands or the Committee on Rail-The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is inclined to think that it ought to go to the Committee on Railroads, and I submit the matter to the Chair to determine as to the reference of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no interest in this matter. The only reason why I made the suggestion is because it seems to me in the reference of bills there ought to be some little care taken to have them referred to a committee having proper jurisdiction of the subject. Sometimes bills are referred to committees, and of the subject. Sometimes oills are referred to committees, and they thus get jurisdiction when it was not really the intention of the Senate to give it. It occurred to me on hearing the title of the bill read that it ought to go to the Committee on Railroads, and upon further investigation I am still inclined to that opinion. That is all I desire to say. I should be glad to hear the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on that question.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill, I understand, does not deal with public lands at all but simply impressed that warm railroad council.

lic lands at all, but simply imposes a duty upon railroad corporations which have obtained a right of way through the public lands. The right of way is already granted; the interest of public lands has already been dealt with; but the bill imposes a duty upon such railroad corporations as have obtained the right of way through public lands to construct certain depots within a given distance of county seats. I think the Committee on Railroads is unquestionably the committee to which the bill should be referred be referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the bill should be referred to the Committee on Railroads, and it will be so referred, without objection on the part of the Senate. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 1, upon which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Peffer] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARDER, Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to

HARRIS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to introduce a bill out of order?

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1115) to authorize the investigation by the Attorney-General of certain claims alleged to be due the late proprietors of the Knoxville Whig for advertising, and authorizing the payment therefor by the Secretary of the Treasury of any amounts found by the Attorney-General to belegally or equitably due; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 1116) for the relief of Mrs. Hannah Waters, of Horn Island, in Mississippi Sound; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee

AMENDMENT TO URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

It is an amendment proposing to give two months' pay to clerks of the Senate after the long session two years ago, under a resolution of the Senate. I move that the amendment be re-ferred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consid-14. Isonato, as in Committee of the whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PEFFER to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance

Mr. PEFFER addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 13th instant. After having spoken nearly two hours,

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me that I may submit a report.
Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

MORMON CHURCH PROPERTY.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 34) providing for the disposition of certain personal property and money now in the hands of a receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, appointed by the supreme court of Utah, and authorizing its application to the charitable purposes of said church, to report it with an amendment; and as it is a matter of some importance and will not take any time, I ask that the joint resolution be put on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 9, after the word "thereof," to add:

That is to say, for the payment of the debts for which said church is legally or equitably liable, for the relief of the poor and distressed members of said church, for the education of the children of such members, and for the building and repair of house of worship for the use of said church, but in which the rightfulness of the practice of polygamy shall not be inculcated.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not at the present time object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I will withhold any objection until the Senator from Colorado will make a brief statement in regard to what the measure is. I should like to know how much money is involved, and precisely what the money is derived

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the sum involved is about Mr. TELLER. I understand that the sum involved is about $300,000. This is the personal property of the Mormon Church that went into the hands of the receiver, which, under the decision of the court, goes to the church. When the receiver took possession of the property he claimed that about $75,000 should come to him, which the church had collected in the way of tithes and paid out. Although the church had disposed of it to such an extent that it could not recover it, the church was compalled in order to have no trouble with the receiver, to have no such an extent that it could not recover it, the church was compelled, in order to have no trouble with the receiver, to borrow that amount of money out of bank, and it turned over to the receiver instead of property that amount of money. This is for the purpose of enabling the church to pay back the $75,000 which it borrowed, which it could not pay out under the ruling of the court except on the passage of this measure. The joint resolution has the approval of the Judiciary Committee, with the amendment reported. I believe it has the approval of the Department and everybody who has any interest in it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the Senator from Colorado whether the joint resolution stands as passed by the House of Representatives?

Mr. TELLER. It is the same, except that under the joint resolution as passed by the other House it may be uncertain whether the church could pay the $75,000. It is not desired that it shall pay it, because that is a debt the church is not able to pay, and Mr. TELLER. which in equity it never ought to have been required to pay over to the receiver. It is the money handed to the receiver which is to be paid back to the church; that is all.

Mr. DOLPH. But the amendment of the committee goes further, I think, and authorizes the money to be expended in part for the erection of houses of worship.

Mr. TELLER. The whole matter is charitable. The Supreme Court of the United States practically declared that it was to be turned over to the church for charitable purposes, and edly it could use it without this provision being put in, but the committee, or rather the subcommittee, which had it in charge, thought it best to put it in. Really, the measure is for the purpose of enabling the church to receive back $75,000 in cash that it advanced to the receiver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair).
The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. After the word "church," in line 16, I move to insert the words "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WEADOCK, Mr. COCK-RELL, and Mr. NEWLANDS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend an act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 824) granting settlers on certain lands in Oklahoma Territory the right to commute their homestead entries, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other will state now that I have not the slighest desire to occupy I will state now that I have not the signest desire to occupy the time of the Senate. Our side of the question has been presented in various phases, and I wish to present in consecutive form the argument which impels the side to which I belong, in the most serious and earnest manner, to present their views to the country, and I hope I shall have an opportunity at a subsequent period to continue my argument on this question.

With that statement, I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before making the motion I contemplate, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the occasions have been very few during the sixteen years I have had the honor of serving here on which I have consumed a moment of the time of the Senate in respect of any matter personal to myself; but the ut-terances of one of the great newspapers of the country on yester-day causes me to ask the indulgence of the Senate for only two or three minutes in order that I may respond.

Some two or three days ago, stepping into my committee room, I met a reporter of the New York Sun and had two or three I met a reporter of the New York Sun and had two or three minutes' conversation with him at his instance. He first asked me, "What is the status of the repeal bill?" "Oh," I said, "it is the unfinished business in the Senate; it has the rightof way; it is open to debate and to amendment." He then asked, "Why does not the Vice-President call a vote and demand a vote upon the direct passage of the bill?" I said, "Simply because he has the direct passage of the bill? I said, "Simply because he has no power under the rules of the Senate or the parliamentary law which controls it to do any such thing." He said, "How are the rules amended?" I said, "Just as the Senate proceeds to perform any other one of its duties. When a proposition to amend the rules is presented, it is considered by the Senate under the rules is presented, it is considered by the Senate under the rules is presented. der the existing rules and it is disposed of according to the will of the Senate under the rules that exist." He said, "Why can not the Vice-President order a direct vote upon the passage of the bill regardless of the rules and the parliamentary law?" "Oh," I said "I do not think that you or I or the Vice-President will live long enough to see any man who ever reaches the high position of President of the Senate and presides over that august body undertake to usurp such a power or to exercise any power which is not given him by the rules of the body and the par-liamentary law which controls it."

I noticed a somewhat confused report in the Sun of the next day as to what I had said about the parliamentary status, which satisfied me that I had made a very bungling statement of the parliamentary situation, or that the reporter had failed utterly to comprehend the idea which I had intended to express. One clause of the report rendered the construction possible that I had indulged in the language of threat as to the Vice-President in the event that he should rule in a given way upon a given
